THE 1932 PROBLEM

TO MAKE THIS A YEAR OF RESULTS TO ADVERTISERS...

Solved!

WITH BETTER DIRECT RETURNS
NOW THAN IN BOOM TIMES...

To give Digest advertising more work and longer hours, we created The Advertising Guide, thus increasing coverage and extending utility. (See note.)

To enlarge and vitalize public interest, we ran two colossal polls (Prohibition and Presidential) — each a 20,000,000 ballot test of national sentiment.

To keep The Digest always fresh in mind, we advertise its special services, steadily and strongly, using display cards in street-cars and airplanes, news broadcasts, letters and publication advertising.

And how did the plan work out? First, with reduced rates, advertisers found their cost-per-inquiry going down — and thanked us, in no uncertain terms. Then, many found The Digest bringing better total returns than during boom times. Not in years have we had such widespread appreciation and applause.

We mean comments like these: "Over 5670 inquiries from the page" (insurance) — "Broken all previous records... 2100 inquiries in a single day" (resort) — "Inquiries for less than half the average cost" (soap) — "7392 coupons from a single column, each with 10 cents for sample" (mouth-wash) — "The double column brought 11,602 inquiries" (ink) — and so on.

For many, many kinds of products and services, the story is the same. Returns per-dollar invested have gone up, costs per order come down. Doesn't this success, in the face of obvious obstacles, suggest that we have made 1932 a Digest year? Doesn't it make you curious about our plans for 1933? ... Investigate.

The "Advertising Guide" lists Digest advertisers, summarizes their messages, mentions booklet and sample offers, refers to page and issue — preaches quality — pulls extra inquiries. Every month The Digest advertises your advertising in this way without cost to you. About one million guides have been mailed this year to Digest renewal subscribers and book buyers... May we send you specimen copies?

ABOUT this time last fall, The Literary Digest tackled the selling problem for 1932 and laid sound and far-reaching plans to increase the energy of its advertising pages.

Already The Digest interested a great group of solid, open-minded citizens, ready to buy and able to pay even in times of economic stress — good prospects for practically anything.

To make it easier for advertisers to reach this audience, we first reduced rates a flat 25% on all space, effective January 1. (Other weeklies made cuts of only 10% — and nine months later.)

TOPICS OF THE DAY

War-Debt Fat in the Fire Again

IN THE DARKEST DAYS OF THE CIVIL WAR, President Abraham Lincoln envisaged defeat for reelection.

He pledged himself so to cooperate with his successor as to save the Union before the end of his term.

In the dark days of nation-wide, world-wide depression, President Herbert Hoover calls to his side for counsel the man who had beaten him in the election of the week before. The occasion was the appeal of our European debtors for suspension of payments due December 15, a move almost unanimously opposed by members of Congress.

President Hoover's gesture of cooperation is hailed everywhere as wise, politic, patriotic, statesman-like. President-elect Roosevelt's gracious acceptance similarly wins the plaudits of the press.

The act of cooperation is spoken of as a notable political precedent. It is the kind of thing which has been contemplated on several occasions, but never carried out to the extent of an actual meeting of outgoing and incoming executives.

But certain thoughtful writers point out that perhaps it won't be a precedent at all. They remind us that the new Norris anti-lame-duck amendment to the Constitution is likely to be in effect before another Presidential election comes along, and that the consequent halving of the time between election and inauguration will greatly reduce the necessity of bridging over the waiting period by some kind of emergency cooperation.

President Hoover announced a desire to be helpful in his congratulatory message to his successful opponent directly after the election. He soon had his chance.

SEPTEMBER 15 was the date on which our European debtors should have given notice that they could not meet the payments due on December 15. But instead, it seems that the news had somehow leaked out that we were having a Presidential election this fall, and the wise statesmen in London and Paris, having had experiences with elections in their own countries, could understand very well that to spring the war-debt controversy right in the middle of our campaign might have very unpleasant consequences all around. So they waited till after election.

But they did not wait very long. The payments are due on December 15, and Congress meets on December 7. Congressional action is necessary for complete postponement. Hence the notes from England, from France, from lesser debtors, informing the President that unfortunate circumstances have played havoc with that "capacity to pay" which is the basis of American debt policy, and wouldn't it be a good idea to postpone these December payments while arrangements could be made for a conference to reconsider the whole debt-payment scheme?

WHILE Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hoover were quietly conferring in the effort to devise an American policy that would not have to be changed in March, the whole country, at least as represented by the press and by politicians, economists, and what we call publicists, broke out in a perfect hubbub of debt discussion. Cancellation, revision, repudiation, and default are words that bob up on every editorial page. To some writers it is a very simple matter, to others it is infinitely complex.

THE simplest way of looking at it, perhaps, is represented by the Hearst papers. "Mischief Is Afoot About the War Debts," cries a warning editorial head-line on the front page of the New York American. The New York Journal goes on to hint that postponement means cancellation, and that cancellation of these governmental debts is bound to lead to a clamor for similar treatment of private debtors in both Europe and South America, and "that would mean eleven billions, plus six billions, plus several more billions, which Americans stand to lose on the deal."

What should America say to all this? The Denver Post has a simple answer:

"The best way for the United States to settle the debt problem is to say to Europe, 'We will not consider any proposition for cancellation or further reduction of the debts you owe us.' And then the United States should refuse to enter into or send even an 'unofficial observer' to any conference on international debts."

Here is similar counsel from the Columbus Ohio State Journal:

"Half the national debt of the United States is in the form of loans to Europe. The loans were made in good faith by the American people. Whatever concessions or reductions are made by the President and Congress will have to be paid by American citizens in taxes.

"We hope our Government will never consent to cancellation. Let the threatened failure to pay be in the form of repudiation on the part of European nations rather than willing cancellation on our part."

Then comes from the precisely opposite direction the other simple solution. The Baltimore Sun tells us: "The thing to do is to sweep this ghastly mess out of doors, once and for all." Indeed, in The Sun's opinion, "the thing is very simple":

"The moment you compel a nation to deliver a prescribed sum annually to another nation, you compel the first nation to seek by all manner and means to create a balance of trade abroad from which the payment may be made.

"It is not a natural effort of trade which may be mutually beneficial. It is an unnatural and artificial effort which, under the most favorable circumstances, may play havoc with normal

Japanese in Manchuria. Even books are being written, and space is sufficient to call attention only to a very few sample suggestions that are being talked about in these few days before the problem is turned over to the lame-duck session of the Seventy-second Congress.

Significant because of its backing is the report of the formidably named Committee for the Consideration of Intergovernmental Debts. The report was prepared under the auspices of the Twentieth Century Fund, by a group of internationally known American economists, and was indorsed by fifty-one leaders in our business and public life. The report argues that "a reasonable readjustment of intergovernmental debts promises far greater material benefits to the American people than the direct income which would be received if payment could be made in full." And then three recommendations are made:

"That the elected representatives of the American people recognize this vital and delicate problem as a non-partizan issue to be settled strictly on its merits in the best interests of the United States.

"That Congress authorize, by the recreation of the World War Foreign Debt Commission or otherwise, such reconsideration and readjustment of the debt-funding agreements as would best redound to the economic advantage of the United States.

"That Congress extend the moratorium for a sufficient period to give time for the negotiations necessary for the proposed readjustment."

It seems to Senator Borah that "proposals for postponement and for moratoriums should be accompanied by a program which will give some assurance that things will be different from this time on." The Idaho Senator, it will be remembered, has suggested that debt revision be tied up with arrangements to help the American farmer sell his crops abroad and with various modifications of the Versailles Treaty. In view of the approaching Democratic control of the entire Government, several newspapers call attention at this time to the practical suggestion made by Alfred E. Smith last April:

"Let us say to the nations of Europe who owe us money that we will forget all about it for twenty years, and not only will we do that but we will write off as paid each year 25 per cent. of the gross value of American products which they buy from us. This, in effect, is to say to any nation which owes us money, if it purchases $100,000,000 of our cotton we will forget $25,000,000 of its indebtedness. If it will buy $100,000,000 of our wheat, our fruit, our tobacco, or any of our manufactured products, we will forget $25,000,000 of its indebtedness. Figures here used are arbitrary and are intended to express the principle. This will help the farmer; it will help the mill-owner; it will help the manufacturer; it will help the railroads and the transportation industries and, in turn, help all the various lines of activities that are dependent upon the railroads.

"I assert that this is a far better way to restore trade than the present method of sitting idly by, clamoring for the payment of the debts which we know can not be paid and thereby losing for the farmers and manufacturers and working men of the United States more billions of dollars than the whole European debt."

In the ultimate settlement of the debt problem the alternatives which Walter Lippmann can see are cancelation, repudiation, and revision. As he writes in one of his syndicated articles which we find in the Philadelphia Record:

"The policy of Cancelation can be dismissed quickly. The American nation will not offer it and none of the important debtors will ask for it. The fundamental objection to cancelation is that it would impair treaty obligations in a world which depends for its security and its prosperity upon treaties.

"The policy of Repudiation, or the near-equivalent which would be indefinite default, is one which some persons profess to desire. It would be even more disastrous than cancelation. For the repudiation of a great debt, or even default on it, by the oldest and most respected financial power in the world would impair public and private obligations everywhere.

trade. Make that artificiality well-nigh universal—with Germany struggling to get a balance to pay France and England and Italy and other nations, and with all these nations struggling to get a balance to pay the United States.

"Then go to your next step. It is the maddened building of tariff walls to guard against the pushing in of artificially ordered trade from all the struggling nations.

"Then go to your final step. It is the use of gold to make payments after artificially ordered export of goods has failed.

"And there you are! Every important nation on earth tied into a knot commercially and industrially, first, by attempts at artificial stimulation of exports and next by tariff embargoes to stop the artificial exports.

"And then, on top of that trade paralysis is the destruction of monetary systems as a result of the enforced effort to pay with gold after payment with goods has become clearly impossible.

"And all of that madness is added to the grave disorders that will and must persist for years as a result of the dislocations incident to the war itself.

"It is all simple enough, if people will stop using the thinking-machinery of the village note-shaver, shrilly insisting that debts are debts. Why not tell the people the truth? Why not tell the people that reparations and war debts are a deadly blood-clot in the stream of commerce?"

But between these simple solutions come a host of suggestions for reductions and revisions and postponements and conditional arrangements and solutions involving the tariff and disarmament and our farm surplus and the Kellogg pact, and the his debtor. When the debtor is also a customer and a neighbor with whom the creditor must work and live, a revision profitable to both is the human, the decent, and the intelligent course.

"It is to revision of the debts that we shall come as Europe came to it at last in the reparations agreements at Lausanne.

"We shall come to it because all the alternatives are impossible or disastrous, whereas revision, if done wisely and conclusively, will promote the vital interests of the American nation."

ONE of the greatest obstacles that advocates of debt modification have to combat is the "argument that the debtor nations are currently paying more for armaments than their remittances to this country," notes Edward H. Collins, financial editor of the New York Herald Tribune. He then puts down figures, showing that in the British budget, 13.6 per cent. of expenditures go to armaments, and only 4.1 per cent. to war-debt payments; France, 27.4 per cent. to arms and 2 per cent. to debts; Italy, 33.1 per cent. to arms, 1.4 to debts; Belgium, 11.3 to arms, 2 per cent. to debts; Poland, 29.5 per cent. to arms, 1.9 to debts. But Mr. Collins makes this interesting point:

"There are two essential differences between armament payments, however, and foreign-debt payments, which make such comparative tables almost meaningless. In the first place, in a country such as England, with a depreciated currency the [debt] payments are now about once and a half as heavy a burden as they were when they were contracted. This means that, judged by its effect on the British budget, the present year's annuity of $184,000,000 would be the equivalent of $255,000,000 with the pound at parity.

"More important is the distinction between internal and external payments. Armament expenditures involve merely a redistribution of the national income; payments abroad involve the transference of values to foreign countries. In practise this can be accomplished in one or more of four ways—by the export of goods, services, gold, or securities. It is the difficulty—not to say the impossibility—of obtaining exchange through any of these processes, under present world conditions that constitutes the real problem of the settlement of international debts."

HOWEVER, there is a real relation between debts and arms reduction. For instance, if the Hoover disarmament plan were to go through it would mean in dollars and cents "a slash in our national budget of $242,000,000, or almost enough to make up our loss in debt payments." And that, coupled with the budget relief that would be afforded Europe, is the real reason, says Mr. Collins, "why debts and arms reduction are closely related."

The New York World-Telegram is specific. Here are the facts, it says: "The debts can not be paid in full; international payments must be made either in gold, goods, or services—and none of these methods is practicable in this instance." And here, it says, are the two immediate steps that should be taken:

"The first is extension of the Hoover disarmament plan to include consideration of the debts. The second is a revision of the debt commitments. The second is a revision of the debt commitments."

To the New York World-Telegram is specific. Here are the facts, it says: "The debts can not be paid in full; international payments must be made either in gold, goods, or services—and none of these methods is practicable in this instance." And here, it says, are the two immediate steps that should be taken:

Battle of the License Tags

IT WAS A MERRY FLARE-UP WHILE IT LASTED.

Among its immediate consequences were the holding up of hundreds of trucks along the Pennsylvania-New Jersey border, the loss of thousands of dollars in perishable goods, and alarm and confusion among manufacturers, produce growers, packing-houses, and trucking interests in the two States.

And for a time it seemed as if the issue raised by the Keystone State would involve it also with its other neighbors, New York, Ohio, Maryland, Delaware, and West Virginia. As it was, one observer reported "repercussions" in twenty-three States.

Altho a truce was arranged before the conflict spread from a border skirmish between two States to a full-fledged "war of the license tags" on six fronts, it served to emphasize in dramatic fashion a problem which, many declare, cries for solution. This is the problem of regulating interstate trucking, especially as it affects the rights of States in regard to the use of their respective highways.

THE trouble had its roots in a new law requiring all out-of-State trucks, operating "for hire" in Pennsylvania more than fifteen days a year, to take out Pennsylvania licenses. In the early days of this month, New Jersey retaliated by barring from its roads "every type of Pennsylvania truck not bearing a New Jersey license."

In a few days a truce was declared, pending decision in the courts.

A big problem remains," however, as the Philadelphia Record reminds us. The Pennsylvania law "must be repealed," it declares, because "motor transport is in a chaotic condition, and the action taken by Pennsylvania and the other States adds to the chaos." "The outbreak serves once more to call attention to the desirability of regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission," remarks the Philadelphia Inquirer; but The Evening Public Ledger dissents from this view, declaring that cooperation between highway officials of adjacent States has been effective before in dealing with motor problems, and should continue to be."

Future of the Republican Party

REORGANIZE OR DIE!

That blunt warning is served on the Republican party by Nicholas Murray Butler, once its Vice-Presidential candidate.

And at the same time other leaders of the G. O. P., picking through the wreckage left by the Democratic typhoon, are wondering where to begin the work of reconstruction.

That President Hoover will have little, if anything, to do with the reorganization plans seems certain to George Van Slyke of

"If something of this sort can not be done, the Republican party will have gone the way of the Whig party, and will soon pass out of existence because of its incapacity to face the future with understanding and with courage."

In that event, "a new and truly Liberal party will quickly be born, composed of the very best elements of the Republican and Democratic parties."

A regenerated Republican party or a new Liberal party, Dr. Butler says, must have as its program: balancing of budgets, elimination of special privilege, administration of natural resources in the public interest, elimination of tariff obstacles to trade, readjustment of the war debts, and an international monetary system.

Whatever may be the reaction to Dr. Butler's proposal, all factions in the party recognize "the imperative need for reorganization," says Mr. Van Slyke, "but the way to proceed has not yet appeared, and must be worked out through political evolution during the next few months"—

"Control of the party organization now passes back into the national committee, which is dominated by the regulars who are not and never have been cordial to President Hoover. The Hoover influence has fallen to almost nothing.

"Now the Republicans turn to the upbuilding of their party with the idea that the new leader and the new candidates must be developed through their own initiative and not by edict or mandate.

"Congressman Bertrand H. Snell is in about the strongest position of any individual among the prominent Republicans. He will be the organization spokesman in Washington. Had the Republicans won, he would have been Speaker of the House.

"He has a good following in both the so-called Coolidge and Hoover groups and, better than any officeholder, may be able to guide the get-together movement about to be undertaken.

"Altho in eclipse for four years, the regulars who are classed as the old guard politicians in the party are still on the job, and in a test to-day undoubtedly would control the Republican machinery. The reorganization must start in the States, but will first come to the surface in the national committee."

One of the severest blows dealt the Republicans, adds Mr. Van Slyke, is that the party lost so many State governments, for "the States are the training-school for candidates for the Presidency."

Among those who may take a conspicuous part in any reorganization movement, he notes, are Senator Reed of Pennsylvania and James W. Wadsworth, Jr., former New York Senator, elected to the House of Representatives, "who is being pushed forward as a leader for the new movement."

Another National Reconstruction Program

the Republican New York Sun—"the Hoover influence has fallen to almost nothing."

As for Calvin Coolidge, "by his own inclination he can be dismissed from consideration both of the Republican Presidential nomination in 1936 and from providing leadership to the party while it is out of power." So declares Mark Sullivan, noted Washington correspondent, in a copyrighted dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune.

It is to the youth of the party that the Republicans must turn, asserts Dr. Butler, seventy-year-old president of Columbia University and an outstanding foe of Prohibition.

Since 1919, "the party, as represented by the vast majority of its office-holders at Washington, has been moving steadily toward intellectual, moral, and political bankruptcy"—

"It has managed to get on the wrong side of every important question which confronts the anxious American people."

And the result is, says Dr. Butler, that the voters have thrown the party into receivership. But—

"If the young men and young women who bear the party name, and who have become so impatient of the intellectual, moral, and political incompetence of so many of the office-holders and office-seeking class who have dominated the party organization, particularly since 1920, will exert themselves to seek a new, more constructive, forward-facing, and liberal leadership for the party, despite its overwhelming defeat, may be quickly reorganized and given new strength and new spirit for another generation of public service."

As foreshadowed by "The Literary Digest's" poll.

As determined by the voters on November 8.

The Line-Up of the States in the 1932 Presidential Election

Explanation: The "doubtful" States in the left-hand map—New Hampshire, Connecticut, and New Jersey—were adjudged by "The Digest," editorially, in our issue of November 5, as possible recruits to the Roosevelt column on Election Day, altho the actual poll figures gave them to Hoover. On the other hand, Massachusetts and Rhode Island were positively conceded by us to Roosevelt, despite the poll figures—and that is why they are white in the first map as well as the second.

Our Poll Is O. K.—What Price Pennsylvania?

THE EFFECTIVE BULL'S-EYE scored by the greatest of DIGEST Presidential straw votes is more than acknowledged by a nation-wide chorus of congratulations, spiced with exclamations of astonishment.

Here we insert a tentative summary of the poll's score-card, figured from the latest election returns at this writing—and these percentages are probably final:

Accuracy in definitely forecasting the "landslide" election of Roosevelt—100 per cent.

Accuracy in forecasting the Electoral Vote at 474 to 57 (the election result was 472 to 59)—99.6 per cent.

Accuracy in forecasting Roosevelt's proportion of the popular vote—98.89 per cent.

Poll fans do not need to be reminded that Roosevelt scored 59.86 per cent. of the total Hoover-Roosevelt straw votes, not counting the minor candidates. The election figures give him 58.75 per cent. of the Hoover-Roosevelt popular vote, so the DIGEST poll came within 1.11 per cent. of the result!

With these achievements to its credit, it is perhaps not surprising that the LITERARY DIGEST 1932 Presidential poll should now be showered with bouquets and serenaded with the chorus of acclamation mentioned above. But the harmony is broken every now and then by a menacing sound, which grows louder with repetition, like the clumping of the giants in Wagner's "Rheingold," and this jarring note is the mysterious and baffling problem of Pennsylvania.

Why did the DIGEST poll, so amazingly right in so many particulars, miss fire—apparently—in that important State?

THAT poser, repeated on all sides, makes the haunting undertone in the chorus of praise, creating a feeling like that produced by Hamlet's exclamation, "Something is rotten in the State of Denmark."

Editorial writers all over the country treat the unique reversal of Pennsylvania as a first-class political enigma which should be investigated and explained. Thus, for instance, the Albany Knickerbocker Press:

"With slight qualification, the straw-vote sponsors can shout, 'I told you so!' Except for Pennsylvania, THE LITERARY DIGEST's poll, for instance, felt the pulse of the electorate surprisingly accurately.

"Its own diagnosis of that bit of false cue should prove interesting, and possibly may suggest a corrective for what may have caused the wrong slant to be given by the informal vote."

No, THE DIGEST has no "diagnosis" to make in the case of Pennsylvania, and no "corrective" to suggest.

"All we know is what we read in the papers," and some of the Philadelphia papers are quite outspoken on the causes which, they say, underlie the amazing shift from the substantially Rooseveltian Pennsylvania of the DIGEST poll to the scantily Hooverian Pennsylvania of Election Day.

Of course, THE DIGEST takes no side in the Quaker State's always interesting political battle-ground. We think that our readers are entitled to have all the evidence in the case, but we draw no conclusions of our own.

It is pointed out in the Philadelphia Record that a local poll by that newspaper, and other newspaper polls in the State, agreed with the DIGEST poll in forecasting a Roosevelt victory. But it is added that all these polls "dealt only with actual figures, and without allowance for political machines and the controlled vote in boss-ridden Philadelphia and other organization-controlled counties."

The writer of this article, Mr. I. K. Fagan, opens with a summary of our poll results, thus:

"The avalanche of votes that swept Franklin D. Roosevelt into the Presidency Tuesday by the greatest landslide in the history of the country vindicated with a vengeance the remarkable accuracy of THE LITERARY DIGEST's forecast.

"The DIGEST poll predicted Roosevelt would carry 41 States. He won 42.

"THE DIGEST said he would win 474 electoral votes. He got 472.

"THE DIGEST listed in the Hoover column the States of Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New Jersey.

"Hoover actually won Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Delaware, and Pennsylvania.

"THE DIGEST commented editorially, however, that Roosevelt probably would win Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and might carry New Jersey.

"Again THE DIGEST was right. These three States went to Roosevelt by resounding margins.

"THE DIGEST was wrong only on two States, Delaware and Pennsylvania, which it gave to Roosevelt.

"In the case of Delaware it said the vote would be close.

"It was the Pennsylvania prediction that proved the enigma of the poll. All indications pointed to the startling conclusion that Roosevelt would win this rock-ribbed Republican State.

"In fact, THE DIGEST said, in its final summary, that 'We know of no reason why the poll should go very far astray in the figures and percentages from Pennsylvania.

"Actually, Hoover carried Pennsylvania by a margin exceeding 160,000. However, the DIGEST poll dealt with cold figures. It did not take into consideration the most important factor in Pennsylvania politics—the Organization machine, both in the city and State, the machine that in the past has made majorities to order.

"How much fraud there was in manipulations of returns in Pennsylvania can only be guessed at, on the basis of past and malodorous performances. Perhaps the Federal investigation in the offing may disclose the extent of the juggling."

AND here's another straw to show which way the wind blew in Pennsylvania on Election Day. William Doherty, Universal Service correspondent, relates in a Washington dispatch which we quote from the New York American:

"A formal decision to contest the election of James J. Davis, member of three Republican Cabinets, as Senator-elect from Pennsylvania, was announced to-night by S. Davis Wilson, special counsel for the House Elections Investigating Committee.

"Wilson made his announcement after a telephone talk with Lawrence H. Rupp, Democratic Senatorial candidate.

"The contest is likely to be investigated by the Howell Committee of the Senate, and ultimately by the Senate Committee on Elections and Privileges.

"Earlier, evidence enough to give Governor Roosevelt an additional thirty-six electoral votes and to elect Rupp as Senator was claimed before the House Committee by Wilson.

"Wilson said a recount would show enough illegal votes for President Hoover to swing the State to Roosevelt, and that a suit would be filed challenging the entire electoral vote of the State.

"The attorney who deputized half a dozen investigators to scrutinize the balloting in Pennsylvania said he uncovered 40,000 votes improperly cast for Hoover in Philadelphia alone.

"The committee also heard Stuart Lynch, head of the investigating group which studied the Delaware voting, report on alleged irregularities in Wilmington. Lynch told of testimony from four Army officers at Wilmington, watchers at the polls, that they had seen votes 'bought for one or two dollars, with a couple of drinks on the side.'"

WE have some more stories from Pennsylvania, but before quoting them we want to display some of the bouquets that are being thrown at the poll from all over the country.

All we can say in answer to the loud applause is this:

"When better polls are built, THE DIGEST will build them."

The Topeka Capital draws this interesting conclusion:

"What it [the poll] demonstrates is that telephone numbers and automobile numbers are representative of the United States, not only politically but generally. The same poll would tell the average income of the United States. It would tell the religious creed of the United States. If it fits politics so closely, it would fit every other way. Telephone numbers and automobile tags represent the United States."

Turning to the farthest Old South of romance, we find this spray of orange blossoms in the New Orleans States:

"Time was when we lacked faith in the dependability of straw votes, even as thoroughly organized as those of THE DIGEST. Four years ago, especially, we questioned their reliability, only in the end to be dumfounded when the national vote was counted. Perhaps, then, our skepticism was because we so ardently hoped for Al Smith's triumph despite the religious issue that was injected into the campaign.

"This year, supporting Governor Roosevelt, THE DIGEST's weekly summaries of the trend of American sentiment especially intrigued us, but there was still a lingering fear in this office that its polls were possibly too good to be true."

The Kansas City Journal Post says, "Franklin D. Roosevelt can feel no more triumphant than the editors of THE LITERARY DIGEST."

The St. Louis Post-Dispatch suggests playfully that our polls should be suppressed because they spoil the game of election betting. The Lancaster Intelligencer-Journal declares:

"According to Mr. Secretary of Treasury Mills, the LITERARY DIGEST straw vote is 'distressingly accurate.' It was accurate, Pennsylvania to the contrary, but THE DIGEST does not need to feel badly about missing Pennsylvania. THE DIGEST did not know, as much of the country does not know, that Pennsylvania has the largest slum vote; has the largest vote where the 'boss' tells them how to vote; has the largest number of vote thieves; has the largest purchasable vote. Three of these THE DIGEST nor any other medium can hope to reach in a straw vote poll. They are a kind of forgotten men and women in Pennsylvania; many of whom want to be forgotten."

"Your forecast of the sentiment in the State of Pennsylvania," writes Emerson P. Jennings from Wilkes-Barre, "I believe is much more accurate than the vote shows.

"If we could eliminate the padded registrations from the official account, I believe that the results from Pennsylvania would harmonize very close to 100 per cent. with the LITERARY DIGEST poll, and give the State to Mr. Roosevelt. For verification I can give you, should you wish it, a considerable amount of data in the form of evidence that I have laid before the District Attorney of this county, from districts in the city of Wilkes-Barre."

Our mail-bags are full of pleasant surprises. We give a few brief excerpts:

From Gordon D. Boynton, attorney-at-law, Boston: "Your magazine has demonstrated without any question that it is the foremost in the country acting as a barometer in recording correctly the sentiments of the country. . . . I might say in closing that I am a Republican, and was anything but satisfied with the outcome of the elections, but I was deeply impressed with your ability accurately to record public opinion."

From William J. Landman, attorney and counselor, Grand Rapids: "As a verification of your 'uncanny accuracy,' permit me to call your attention to the fact that in your LITERARY DIGEST of October 22 you gave your balloting on the Presidential election in Grand Rapids as follows—Hoover, 2,343; Roosevelt, 2,341. The actual vote in Grand Rapids was—Hoover, 29,778; Roosevelt, 28,728."

Stampede Back to the Land

BACK TO THE FARM THEY GO.

Back where food and shelter are more easily obtained than in the depression-scourged cities.

The soft hands of the ribbon clerk, who left the farm for a city job, must gather calluses again as he returns to pitchfork and hoe. The desk worker, instead of reporting at the office at nine o'clock, must report at the cow-shed at dawn. Garage workers, factory hands, stenographers, and other thousands who have lost their jobs are turning back home in increasing numbers. Consequently, just around the corner is a new record for farm population.

If the city-to-country trend indicated by latest figures is maintained, we shall soon break the old peak total of 32,077,000 rural population recorded in January, 1910.

Our Department of Agriculture forecasts a total of 32,000,000 by January on the basis of figures compiled for the first three months of this year. In that period the farm population showed a net increase of 263,000. And—

"The net gains in farm population in 1930 and 1931, plus the projected gains this year, will more than offset the decrease of approximately 1,500,000 people in the farm population from the years 1920 to 1930. The farm population estimates clearly indicate the effect of the current business depression."

"Since the farmer's most persistent and pressing problem is that of surplus crops," remarks the New York Sun, "those farmers who have remained on the land from 1920 to the present time may not relish the thought of thousands of competitors in a market that is now too well supplied." "On the other hand," says the Washington Post, "as industry recovers, a larger market for agricultural products will be created, and many industrial workers who have been forced into farming by hard times will return to their jobs, thus relieving competition on the farms."

The French Arms Plan That Shocks Germany

"ARMED TO THE TEETH and pacific to the core!" That description of the French people is said even by some English editors to fit perfectly the French proposals to the Disarmament Conference issued on November 14. Yet even in England some consider the new French plan an improvement over earlier ones.

But no such toleration is found among German officials and German editors.

The new French plan, as summarized in press cables, provides for reducing European national armaments and armies to a

The plan "represents an impossibility," according to a high German military authority close to Minister of Defense Gen. Kurt von Schleicher, who is reported in a Berlin Universal Service press-cable from Charles L. Flick, to have said:

"What Germany wants is equality of armaments. Herriot's plan does not concern us since we are not represented at the Disarmament Conference. If we were, our only answer could be: where is German equality?"

OTHER opinions cited in these Berlin dispatches indicate government officials as saying that:

"Herriot's plan does not mention German security or equality or German naval disarmament and other depleted war stocks.

"France alone would retain an excellently equipped Colonial Army, numbering 250,000 men, whereas we do not have a single colonial soldier.

"The proposal to give invocation of political and economic sanctions to a majority vote of the League of Nation's Council represents a grave danger to Germany."

A rather sneering comment is heard from another German Government authority who is reported by the Universal Service as saying disdainfully:

"The good points of the Herriot plan are Utopian, while the rest constitutes an extremely clever scheme to perpetuate French domination of Europe.

"The German Government might be willing to discuss a number of the plan's points with Premier Herriot when Foreign Minister von Neurath goes to Geneva November 21, but it is improbable that Germany will reenter the Disarmament Conference unless more clearly defined equality guaranties are first given."

AMONG outstanding editorials cabled to THE LITERARY DIGEST from the German press, we find utter disapproval in the comment of the Berlin Germania, formerly spoken of as close to ex-Chancellor Bruening. This newspaper observes:

"The plan is not distinguished by the same generosity and clarity as was President Hoover's. Not material disarmament but the extension of security through treaties is the key-note.

"It is clearly recognizable as another form of the Geneva Protocol of 1924. When the French sought to make Article XVI of the League Covenant automatically function, she held up her sanction of other measures.

"Ever since, Paris tenaciously cherished the sanctions idea, and sought such ideas as Briand's European pact to perpetuate the present European territorial situation.

"The French saw in Secretary Stimson's August statement that violation of the Kellogg pact might necessitate common action by the signatories to the certain advantage of her sanctions policy at Geneva. Now they are using that as an excuse to propose another world security plan."

The industrialist Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung insists that Germany's equality demands must under no circumstances be undermined by specious arguing, and it declares:

"It is not enough that the proposed reorganization of the type of armies will theoretically open the way for later consideration of German equality. The key-note of the proposal is the effort to perpetuate the political hegemony of the single States, and above all of France.

"Regarding the plan for colonies and colonial armies, it is well known that the largest part of the French Colonial Army is a few hours' steaming from her coast, while another part is already quartered in France."

But Mr. Hitler's Voelkischer Beobachter seems at the point of losing its gravity and bursting into laughter over the French invitation to disarm, as it jeers:

"Herriot apparently desires to joke with Germany, proposing defensive scale, setting up the nucleus of an international protective force, and giving equality rights to all countries.

BUT before throwing the old idea of armaments completely overboard, notes P. J. Philip in a wireless to the New York Times, the plan asks that the security of all nations that accept it be guaranteed through the application of the Briand-Kellogg pact, the Covenant of the League, and the creation of special political and military arrangements among the principal European Powers, which would be called to assist any nation in case of attack or invasion.

The paragraphs in the memorandum of the French Government which seem to the Germans to postpone their claims of arms equality indefinitely, may be taken to be those in which the French declare that while the Government "does not recognize the force of the legal argument on which this claim is based, and while it persists in the belief that any solution involving rearmament would be unacceptable as being contrary to the very purpose of the Conference, it has never denied that the problem was among the political problems brought up before the Conference."

that she entrust her security to the League of Nations' Army, of which the kernel will consist of the French war machine.

"Disarmament never occurs to the French leaders. On the contrary, they believe that legerdemain will be able to lead von Papen away from the equality demand which is now recognized in principle by England as well as Italy."

AMONG cabled editorials to THE LITERARY DIGEST from the French press, we find the Paris Temps—semiofficial mouth-piece of the French Foreign Office—charging that Germany is now a militarist State. Noting the "cordial" welcome given to the French proposals outside the Reich, this journal avers:

"The reception given by international opinion to the French plan to organize peace is distinctly favorable. It shows important moral progress in creating new possibilities for the arms parley."

"There is only one exception—Germany—which is entirely dominated by nationalist passion, and lacking in coolness of judgment to the point of betraying with too much imprudence, if not impudence, the selfish motives which control the Reich's foreign policy."

"The moment is nearing when the whole world will realize that nationalist Germany, now transferred into a militarist State, is the only real obstacle to peace in Europe."

But astonishing skepticism appears in the comment of other French newspapers, including the Independent Paris Journal, which cries despairingly:

"God knows all the international organizations in the world will not prevent the attacked nation from resisting the aggressor's first onslaught."

THE Right Wing Paris Avenir also is perturbed by the French proposals, and asserts flatly that:

"The gravest defect in the topsyturvy plan is the destruction of the Versailles Treaty and also of the London Naval Pact."

Cables to THE LITERARY DIGEST from the London press indicate distrustfulness on the part of the Manchester Guardian:

"The French plan can not be said to improve on closer inspection. It is a thoroughly compact, logical mechanism built to satisfy the French ideal of guaranteeing the peace of Europe and, so far as it emerges, the status quo of Europe by means of the ultimate threat of force internationally organized."

"If little seems likely to come from the French plan, the greater, perhaps, will be our chance; the greater, certainly, our duty, to save the Disarmament Conference."

The London Daily Telegraph calls the French memorandum a notable document, but it too has its reservations:

"It is a remarkable, ambitious scheme, and by far the most comprehensive so far produced for combining the organization of security and disarmament by stages."

But then The Daily Telegraph flails the French plan because of the suggestion that the majority of the League Council decide upon the punishment for the aggressor, and it firmly declares that such a proposal is "entirely repugnant to the principle which Great Britain has steadfastly maintained."

To the London Times, it is plain that security overshadows disarmament in the French outline. Still, it is willing to concede that:

"The French plan contains certain points which at first sight are hardly acceptable, but the general sense of the scheme does not conflict with the essence of the British proposals."

"It is an attempt to apply a logical process to the admittedly changing balance of forces. However, it is an improvement over the earlier French plans."

Life-Lines and Life-Lines

JAPAN'S "LIFE-LINE" IS MANCHURIA.
This is the claim of the Japanese.

But the League of Nations is the "life-line" of modern civilization."

This is the courteous retort of Lord Lytton in speaking for the Report of the International Commission of Inquiry he headed, which was appointed by the Council of the League on December 10, 1931.

Many writers, he notes in the London Spectator, have announced, either with approval or regret, that the Commission have found Japan "guilty."

They have done nothing of the sort, declares Lord Lytton, for they were not a judicial tribunal, nor were they judge or jury. If the language of a court is to be used, their function was rather that of a witness, he avers. They have produced evidence. The case is still sub judice before the League. Japan is entitled to be heard, China also, and Lord Lytton proceeds:

"We certainly never expected that our Report would evoke any enthusiasm, either in China or Japan. Neither did we believe that a permanent solution of the Manchurian problem could be achieved immediately, by our proposals or by any other."

"What we did believe was that a solution could be found in the framework of the system of collective responsibility for the maintenance of peace through the world, and by no other means."

WHAT is at stake, he continues, is not whether China or Japan is to control the future destinies of Manchuria, but whether this principle of collective responsibility for peace and justice between nations is to be preserved or sacrificed. He points out then:

"Those who insist that the realities of the situation must be borne in mind should remember this."

"The naval and military strength of Japan, the relative weakness of China, the presence of Japanese troops in Manchuria, the existence of Manchukuo, the chaotic condition of China at the present stage of her political evolution, the importance to Japan of her Chinese markets, the damaging effects of the Chinese boycott on Japanese trade—all these are realities of the situation, and the Commission did not ignore any of them."

"But there is another reality which equally can not be ignored—the existence of the League of Nations, the terms of the Covenant, the Kellogg pact, and the Nine-Power Treaty of Washington."

Why Britain Enrages Russia

WORDS SCORNFUL ENOUGH to express their contemptuous indignation with Great Britain for ending the Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement are sought in vain by Moscow editors.

"The price paid by the British Government to prevent closer relations between Canada and the United States," and "a bribe offered to Canadian capitalists," is how the official Soviet newspaper, Izvestia, describes the abrogation of the treaty.

But, in England, some newspapers say the British Government's act marks "the end of a bad job." Yet a division of opinion among the English press appears from the remark of such a Liberal newspaper as the Manchester Guardian, that "the scandal of the denunciation of the Russian Trade Agreement gets worse with every attempt of Ministers to explain it."

The rumpus was all started by Mr. J. H. Thomas (the Laborite Secretary for the Dominions) when he announced in the House of Commons that the Government "recognized the importance of maintaining the effectiveness of the Ottawa preferences against State action by any foreign country which might stultify the intentions of the preferences." He is further quoted in parliamentary press dispatches as saying:

"This principle is acknowledged in Article 21 of the agreement with Canada. It necessitates H. M. Government in the United Kingdom being in a position to discriminate by prohibition against the import of commodities from any such country."

"This stipulation has rendered necessary the denunciation of the temporary commercial agreement with the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics signed in London on April 16, 1930, which grants to Soviet trade the privilege of most-favored-nation treatment, and which, therefore, would stand in the way of the prohibition, which might in conceivable circumstances be necessitated by the Ottawa obligations."

"A note was therefore addressed, on October 17, to the Soviet Chargé d'Affaires in London, giving notice of the denunciation at six months' date, in accordance with Article 7 of the agreement, and adding that H. M. Government remain anxious for the furtherance of trade with Soviet Russia, and are prepared to enter into discussions for the promotion of this end at the earliest moment."

THIS disrupting decision of the British Government, angrily warns the Moscow Pravda, "threatens the trade relations between the two nations with grave consequences." This official organ of the Central Committee of the Communist party in Moscow also alleges:

"It goes without saying that it is the Right Wing of the Conservative party—led by such die-hards as Winston Churchill and Lord Beaverbrook—which is responsible for this measure tending to undermine the trade between the two countries. A very active rôle, too, was played in this new anti-Soviet provocation by the 'National' Laborites headed by J. H. Thomas."

"The MacDonald-Thomas group are always ready to carry out the dirtiest jobs entrusted to them by the die-hards. Mr. Thomas thus once more appears in the rôle of the vile lackey of the bitterest enemies of the English workers."

Pravda charges, too, that the British decision to end the trade pact is made just when it is especially vital to England that trade relations between the two countries should be normal. In spite of the introduction of protective tariffs and the abolition of the gold standard, Pravda is convinced that "the situation of English capitalism has not improved by an iota."

It speaks of the fall of English exports, of the increase of unemployment, and of a whole lot of troubles in England that tend to show "the class struggle is assuming ever-widening proportions in the country." Yet, disregarding these menacing conditions, Pravda asserts:

"The English die-hards, with their traditional bestial hatred of the Soviet Union, have concluded an alliance with the agrarian bourgeoisie of the Dominions."

"This bourgeoisie is trying to find the way out of the depression by selling their agricultural products at high prices in England. Hence the Ottawa agreements, which in their essence are a hostile act directed against the Soviet Union."

"In keeping with these agreements, the British Government has given a pledge to the Canadian bourgeoisie to start a campaign against the Soviet exports. The denunciation of the Anglo-Soviet Trade Agreement, which deals a heavy blow to the trade between these two countries, is a move in that campaign."

"This unavoidably will lead to the decrease of Soviet purchases and orders in England, just as it has happened in the United States. Worse still, it will result in the rise of commodity prices in England and, especially, of foodstuffs."

"Consequently, the English proletariat and the poorer middle class will be the first ones to suffer from the consequences of this measure."

IT was to be expected, sharply retorts the London Daily Express, that the Government's decision to end the Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement would be received in Moscow with furious tirades against the latest "capitalist plot," and this newspaper goes on:

"It is a capitalist plot to defend the livelihood of British workers."

"The Anglo-Russian Trade Agreement is a menace to workers here. The Russians have so far carried on a lopsided trade with us by methods which have caused grave unemployment in Britain."

"They have been able to dump their produce here, because they have confiscated the factories and farms in Russia, and worked them by slave labor. As a result they have thrown many of our producers on to the scrap-heap."

"At the same time the British taxpayers have been guaranteeing the losses which may fall upon our manufacturers who trade with Russia."

"We can not afford either the cheap goods which Russia sends to us or the high cost of guaranteeing payment for the goods which we send to her."

"If we use our money to build up our own industries, we shall have both employment and a more profitable trade at home and with the Dominions."

"It is not the capitalists who have put Russia beyond the pale of commerce. Russia, by her own peculiar policy, has put herself there. The remedy for that belongs to the Russian people, not the British."

LETTERS AND ART

LITERATURE / DRAMA / MUSIC / FINE-ARTS / EDUCATION / CULTURE

When Painters Turn Self-Models

"NEVER RUN TO MEET AN ARTIST."

This injunction by an art critic, Malcolm Vaughan, as it happens of the New York American, may bear various interpretations.

Artists, actors, singers, and their critics are not necessarily friends.

Mr. Vaughan explains that artists are "often disappointing in the flesh." The artist may be "capable of weaving with his brush a web of golden poetry," but "turn out to be a scrubby little man all bustle and bombast in his conversation," or a "ponderous titan of the paint-box" may emerge an "empty dullard."

Better is it to see him in a self-portrait, or a portrait of him by a brother artist.

And this is just what the Roerich Museum is now providing opportunity to do, in its exhibition of sixty-three such examples of native and foreign artists.

Leon Dabo, the painter, suggested the exhibition, remembering the thrill he felt, when a boy, at seeing such a show in Paris. In a foreword he says that Carolus Duran, "his beard curled and ringleted, was Assyrian and hieratic," and as for Cézanne—

"Like Rembrandt he never tired of himself as model, but unlike Rembrandt, Cézanne continually experimented with his beard, cutting it off to-day, and then growing patches on different planes, which meant a new portrait to be painted.

"I still believe that artists are very important personages, and it occurred to me that an exhibition of our artists' portraits would interest our people."

It is Mr. Vaughan's idea, however, that "self-portraits are rarely good":

"A self-portrait is painted while gazing into a mirror, which is to say, when self-conscious. Accordingly the features are unnaturally immobile; the eye holds a fixt stare and the pose is usually stiff, oftentimes rigidly set. Yet one can at least discover in a self-portrait something of what the painter thinks of himself."

The fad was started in Florence in the seventeenth century, and the Uffizzi gallery has a long line of self-portraits from that early time to the present.

Mr. Vaughan believes a better knowledge of a painter's personality is to be had in a good portrait of him from the brush of one of his colleagues. He writes:

"Indeed, artists' portraits of artists frequently rank among masterpieces; for on such occasions the painter finds in his sitter a sympathetic critic, one who appreciates the problems of the task and wants the finished achievement to reveal, above everything else, a free hand, a royal opportunity.

"It was a happy idea to open the exhibition season of the Roerich Museum with a show of 'Portraits of Artists.' Fortunately the idea ends happily. The three-score canvases now assembled in exhibition reflect remarkable range of method and catholic taste in the selection.

"It is true that several of the works are poor, but the majority are both humanly and artistically pleasing, and some of the examples are so excellent that one wishes we had in America a national portrait gallery in which they might be permanently hung.

"Of the assembled group, the most dramatic, and therefore the most immediately striking, is a large, romantic, expressive presentment of Sidney Dickinson, by Wayman Adams. It sums up the man's personality and at the same time probes beneath his personality with friendly penetration, to his character. Equally delightful is the warm spontaneity of the technical attack, the high, bright coloring and the deftly decorative design which, combined, make the canvas not only a good portrait, but a handsome picture."

SOME other works receive a glance:

"There is an informal self-portrait of Robert Brackman in a red sweater, painted with breadth and boldness; a jesting, hilarious self-portrait of Jerome Myers, tricked out in Rembrandtian fancy dress; a gentle, meditative self-portrait of Orlando Rouland; a picturesque description of 'The Sculptors' busy in their studio, by F. Luis Mora; a strongly naive portrait of Kisling, by Derain, and a sensitively stylized self-portrait of Leon Dabo, this last example a distinguished piece of subtle lyricism both in conception and technical expression.

"From nineteenth-century Europeans there are portraits by Carolus Duran, Tony Robert Fleury, and Fantin-Latour. The nineteenth-century American, Albert P. Ryder, is seen in a valuable portrait of himself. And there are several eighteenth-century English portraits."

If you go to the exhibition looking for your favorite artist, Mr. Royal Cortissoz's summary in the New York Herald Tribune helps. It may be noted that he prefers portraits lacking the professional signs of palet and brush:

It is the artist portrayed in his unprofessional status who repeatedly comes into the foreground on this occasion, the head of Fantin-Latour, by himself; the portrait of Sidney Dickinson, by Wayman Adams; the one of the late Carroll Beckwith, by Carolus Duran; the fine drawing of Sir John Lavery, by Leonebel Jacobs; the distinguished portrait of himself by the late Charles

Paints Himself as Well as a Picture

Orlando Rouland in throes of creating "Sigurd Skou," now exhibited at the Roerich Museum.

W. Hawthorne; the well-designed portrait of himself by F. Luis Mora, and the strong drawing of Rockwell Kent, by Victoria E. Hutson.

"Of course, there is much personal significance attached to the show. It is enchanting, for example, to come across the tiny portrait of Odilon Redon, by Tony Robert Fleury (most unexpected of confrères for the mystical Frenchman!), and the similarly appealing souvenir of Albert P. Ryder, which we owe to his own brush.

"It is good also to see, among the half-dozen bronzes by Paul Paulin, the handsome bust of Degas.

"But it is this matter of the approach to which I have referred that stays longest in the mind. In spite of the various exceptional pieces that might be cited—and among them, by the way, I would place Robert Brackman's portrait of himself—the balance of testimony in respect to esthetic principle is all in favor of the portrait of the artist detached from the atmosphere of the studio. The brush and palet seem, in the long run, to have something factitious about them."

Literature Breaking Soviet Chains

SOVIET AUTHORITIES REALIZE that "literature can not be turned into a publicity agency."

The source of this information is Eugene Zamiatin, a "big name in present-day Russian literature."

Besides being a man of letters, Zamiatin is a civil engineer. He has an ironical mind, and because his irony got into some of his literary work he has spent a few days in jail. Irony is not regarded a Soviet virtue. "His most important novel, 'We,' tho published in translation both in America and in France, has not been passed by the Russian censor yet."

This and other facts concerning Russian literature of the present come from Mr. Zamiatin through the Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian.

First he deals with the writers themselves, and he says that compared with other people they may be considered well-off. He considers himself in an exceptional position with the exclusive use of a three-room flat. Then:

"The successful playwright, who gets his 5 or 6 per cent. of the box-office receipts, is the only "legitimate bourgeois" in Russia to-day; and nobody interferes with his wealth. The same applies, in a lesser degree, to successful novelists. Pilnyak and his family, for instance, have a whole five-roomed house in Moscow.

"Besides authors are given a specially generous payok, or ration-card, which entitles them to butter and cheese, and all the other "luxuries" unknown to so many ordinary mortals. The Soviets are very good to authors in that way.

"All the outstanding professional authors have got this payok. There must be seventy-five such authors in Leningrad, and about a hundred in Moscow. Besides, our publishers do not differentiate as much as your publishers do between famous authors and beginners.

"An unknown man gets about 200 rubles ($100) per 10,000 words on the first edition of, say, 5,000 copies, plus an advance royalty; a well-known author may receive two or three times as much, but not more. The really prosperous authors are those whose books are published in the cheap, popular editions with a minimum printing of 30,000 copies. In the main, however, this applies only to books which are considered "politically useful."

"The Russians to-day, and even the peasants," Zamiatin continued, "are great readers. The country has been psychologically revolutionized. I remember an old peasant woman talking to me about "individual farming" and "collectivization," and, believe me, she pronounced these words as naturally and as easily as tho she were talking about cows and pigs.

"It is true that in the same village I heard another old woman mutter charms.

"One of the effects of the Five-Year Plan—an effect more important even than its "economic achievements"—has been to cure the Russians of their slowness and laziness.

"The new generation believes in machines and in Americanization. It will be curious to watch Russia during the next ten or fifteen years."

Asked what part literature plays in this process, and what is meant by the phrase "literature in the service of the Five-Year Plan," Zamiatin smiled and, being in Paris, spoke out:

"I may be a heretic, but to my mind the phrase means nothing. It is childish idealism. As an engineer, I know that no "industrial novel" will ever produce an extra ton of steel. As a writer, I know that the desire to write on "industrial subjects" has merely produced tons of bad novels. But only a few months ago the whole situation changed.

"To make you understand this change I had better recall the main phrases of Russian literature since the revolution. During the "hungry years"—the years of civil war and military Communism—when the world seemed to be coming to an end, the futurists reigned supreme. They claimed to hold the monopoly of the "new," proletarian art; they soon found that the proletariat would have nothing to do with these épateurs de bourgeois.

"The Nep period was marked by a fresh outburst of literary talent in Russia; but this new literature was not proletarian either. The best writers of that period were officially known as poputchiki—or "fellow-travelers"—they mostly belonged to the intelligentsia, and were not Communists, tho most of them were, or pretended to be, in sympathy with the Soviet Revolution.

"Among these men there were several writers of real talent."

MEANTIME a new class of writers, mainly Communist, had come into being, and of these we hear:

"Unlike the poputchiki, most of these young proletarian writers wrote in a simple, straightforward, tho often rather naive style.

"They looked upon Tolstoy as their model.

"With the beginning of the Five-Year Plan these proletarian writers gained enormously in influence. Their organization, the Rapp (The Russian Association of Proletarian Writers), claimed that they were the only "orthodox" Soviet writers; that they represented the true spirit of Soviet Russia, and it was they who proclaimed the famous doctrine that literature must henceforth serve the Five-Year Plan.

"For a time the Rapp was encouraged "from above," and it soon managed to capture most of the literary reviews and to monopolize literary criticism.

"The Rapp critics, while exaggerating the merits of almost any writer belonging to their organization, were often grossly unfair to the poputchiki.

"Often, and without any apparent reason, they would brand the poputchik books as "antirevolutionary." The effects of this policy were not too good. The poputchiki, who included some of the most gifted Russian writers, tried—with only a few exceptions—to adapt themselves, as best they could, to the requirements laid down by the Rapp critics. Such attempts were not usually successful; both Pilnyak's "Volga" and Leonov's "Sot"—two novels on industrial subjects (they have both appeared in English)—compare very unfavorably with their earlier and more spontaneous writings.

"But a few months ago an unexpected thing happened—it was a real literary coup d'état. The highest Soviet authorities realized that this could not go on; and, probably under the influence of Gorki, they took the bold step of dissolving the Rapp and putting an end to its monopoly.

"The overwhelming influence of the Rapp has, I admit, not been entirely fruitless. Many a writer who was indifferent to industrial subjects began to take an interest in them. Many of the older writers have been carried away by the "new spirit"; all of them have learned the facts, and have closely observed the process.

"The members of the Rapp have now joined the Writers' Union, which was until recently a poputchik organization. I believe it is all to the good; the ex-poputchiki and the proletarians will now influence and supplement each other; and I believe that the literature of to-morrow will be a happy synthesis between the dry realism and dogmatism of the proletarians and the high literary technique and imaginative gifts of the "Fellow-Travelers."

"Within a few years Russia may enter a new era of high literary achievement. The Soviet authorities have fortunately realized that literature can not be turned into a publicity agency."

Girls in Uniform

AFTER A SUCCESSFUL CAREER in the capitals of Europe, an unusual movie is shown in New York called "Maedchen in Uniform."

It may be unnecessary to translate the first word of the title into "Maidens." The story concerns a girls' school in Prussia, and presents, as Arthur Ruhl describes it in the New York Herald Tribune, "a kind of 'purity,' as we use the term in describing a singer's or a violinist's 'purity of tone' which seems to disengage it from the usual preoccupations about means and medium, above all things from showmanship, and to set it by itself as something approaching 'pure' art."

From his point of view it is a lesson for Hollywood:

"The story is about the loneliness of a young, motherless girl, placed by an aunt in a particularly stern and militarized sort of boarding-school, the quite natural, if somewhat unhealthy, 'crush' she gets for the one teacher who does a little something to befriend her; about her and the other girls, more or less similarly situated, lonely, hungry for tenderness, about the wistfulness and bewilderment of adolescence—à quoi rêvent les jeunes filles."

"Tact and taste, as well as tenderness and imaginative understanding, are essential, in any case, for such a theme—one can fancy the field day that Hollywood might have made of it!—but in addition to this, the German authors had a background, including the connotations of the German speech itself, which was precisely what such 'soft' material needed.

"For the school—an actual old stone building, not a studio-set—is in Potsdam, with all that that connotes, and the girls are seen and heard against the old imperial avenues and towers and the blare of garrison bugles. Moreover, the head mistress, perfectly played by Emilia Unda, is no mere fairy-tale ogress, but the convinced advocate of a certain philosophy of life, in whose hardness there is a certain nobility.

"The walls of misunderstanding against which Manuela and the other schoolgirls bruise their hearts is not, therefore—as it might have been, had the film originated in England or America—the mere narrowness of acidulous spinsters, but something approaching, in the circumstances, the dignity of fate.

"And throughout the picture we have, therefore, a dramatic contrast which recalls the peculiarly touching quality of military funerals, in which bugles, stiff salutes, discipline, the whole proud earthly show, only accents personal human sorrow and the aloof beauty of death."

IN Vanity Fair, Pare Lorentz writes a protest against a misapprehension of the theme appearing in some quarters:

"It is not a 'delicate treatment' of what in neo-Freudian days was called abnormal love, simply because in native journals the word delicate has long had a specific definition, i.e.: weasling. The treatment is as simple and straightforward as, for example, the treatment of 'What Price Glory'; the story moves surely to the anguished attempt at suicide; and the concise, lucid, English captions make the dialog—much of which would be unnecessary in any language—perfectly explicable.

"There is no doubt that the author intended to have Manuela's devotion transcend casual friendship; at least, there is no questioning the director's intent. But that devotion is not equivocal; it is as sad and tender and as profoundly motivated as anything you can find in literature, and I can not imagine any one seeing the picture—except, of course, those who expect it to be entertainment as obvious as Minsky's—and still doubting the writer's knowing honesty.

"Furthermore, the school itself is tightly dramatized. All the picayune but terribly important happenings of school life are there: the girl who is kept from the school play because she complained to her parents about the food; the sadistic stupid members of the faculty; the grim headmistress who answers complaints with 'We Prussians have always hungered!'—and the fact that she made these minute events vivid and important is indeed a tribute to the author's skill.

"Above and surrounding the extraordinary characterizations given by the young girls there is a strange tenderness which, like a wood-wind lament, carries through the entire picture a tenderness which is not so much a lugubrious, Teutonic yearning after lost youth as it is the weary admission of one who realizes that, whatever the faults of the ancien régime, it is part of a past which was humbled finally in the loss of a war.

"It is an atmosphere you find in most post-war European literature, but one that particularly dominates German writings; and it accounts for the fact that in this movie, actresses, director, and even the children approached the author with perfect understanding."

Owing perhaps to the success of the film, now running since September 21, and "breaking all box-office records at the Criterion Theater," as The Wall Street Journal reports, a play called "Girls in Uniform," made from the same novel as the film, is announced for early production.

The Cover

FROM far Japan comes little Kazuko Kimura, the subject of the cover. Drest in her native kimono, she is a study in color and charm. The little girl likes to wear American clothes, altho she thinks her Japanese clothes are prettier in a picture.

The artist, Dorothy Drew, portrait painter and muralist, was born in Ethel, Macon County, Missouri. On her mother's side she is a great-niece of the pioneer American sculptor, Joel T. Hart of Kentucky. Her father, the late Dr. Francis Webb Drew from Windsor, England, gave her her first instruction in anatomy and art. Later, she studied art at Soldan, St. Louis, Missouri. She then studied at the Art Students' League under George Bridgman and, finally, at the National Academy of Design.

E. C. Sherburne, critic, writing in review of the 107th Annual Exhibition of the National Academy of Design, says, "'John,' by Dorothy Drew, manifests a command of drawing and pictorial values that gives her painting a larger interest than often obtained in portraiture."

Miss Drew has painted and drawn many portraits which hang in homes here and abroad. She makes her home and has her studio in New York City.

Mrs. Buck's Plea for More Christian Missionaries

YOUR ANCESTORS ARE IN HELL, and all of you who do not believe in Christ will go to hell, too.

A missionary told his Chinese flock that—but he didn't frighten them into becoming Christians.

They couldn't believe that a people who had achieved civilization before Europe was out of its swaddling clothes could be the victims of any God's unending fury.

And Mrs. Pearl S. Buck, who is Chinese born, who played with Chinese children, and who lived within sound of a Buddhist temple bell, doesn't believe it, either. She doesn't believe many things the missionaries teach and preach about God. She is wearied by all their preaching—preaching without works.

A handsome, kindly-faced woman, with dark blue eyes that showed fire behind, and dark brown hair carrying a glint of gold, she rather startled some 1,200 Presbyterian women gathered recently in the Hotel Astor, New York, when she indicted many missionaries for ignorance, moral arrogance, pride of race, and lack of simple charity.

But the author of "The Good Earth," for which she won the Pulitzer Prize for 1932, and of other novels of Chinese life which have added to her fame, still believes in missions—of a kind. Born in China, the daughter of American missionaries whose families lived in Virginia and West Virginia, the wife of a missionary, Dr. J. Lossing Buck, and a missionary herself, both being members of the faculty of Nanking University, she makes out a good case for continuing missionary work in the land of her birth. But, she insists, it must be the best or nothing.

Mrs. Buck's conclusions are very similar to those of the Laymen's Foreign Missionary Inquiry, reviewed in these pages October 22 and November 12.

She does not feel that the Chinese are antiforeign, and they do not want foreign missions withdrawn, she says. Their chief objection to the missionary's work is that "it is often linked with a narrow and superstitious form of religion, and this the intelligent Chinese is loath to see fastened upon his people, even tho it be accompanied with a few hospitals and schools, some flood relief, and such good works." They have a distinct religious feeling, but revolt from superstition in any religion. "One must remember," she says, "that in recent years the local religious persecutions in China have not been against Christianity alone, but against all religions."

Next to the Chinese among whom she has lived, says Mrs. Buck, she knows no group of people better than the missionary, whom she has watched with mingled feelings of curiosity and affection, amusement, pride, and disgust. As she recites:

"I have heard him criticized in the bitterest terms, and I have sometimes agreed with that criticism.

"I have seen the missionary narrow, uncharitable, unappreciative, ignorant. I have seen him so filled with arrogance in his own beliefs, so sure that all truth was with him and him only, that my heart has knelt with a humbler one before the shrine of Buddha rather than before the God of that missionary, if that God could be true.

"I have seen missionaries, orthodox missionaries in good standing in the Church—abominable phrase—so lacking in sympathy for the people they were supposed to be saving, so scornful of any civilization except their own, so harsh in their judgments upon each other, so coarse and insensitive among a sensitive and cultivated people, that my heart has fairly bled with shame.

"I can never have done with my apologies to the Chinese people that in the name of a gentle Christ we have sent such people to them. It is too true. We have sent ignorant people as missionaries, we have sent mediocre people, we have sent arrogant people, we have sent superstitious people who taught superstitious creeds and theories, and have made the lives of hungry-hearted people wretched and more sad.

"I have heard a missionary say, 'Of course I tell these people their ancestors are in hell. If I did not believe that every heathen who did not confess Christ as his Savior burned in hell, I would not be here.' There are still these missionaries. I have heard a questioning Chinese, a man of learning and refinement, listen eagerly and turn away, saying, 'I can not, if this be true, believe in this new religion. Let me rather go with my fathers where they are when I die.'

"My heart said, 'I also, my friend.'

"Preach to Us No More"

"But share with us that better and more abundant life which your Christ lived," says Mrs. Pearl S. Buck to missionary societies. The Chinese-born author of "The Good Earth" is appealing for a higher type of missionary to go to China.

THESE missionaries are the cast-offs of the churches, in the opinion of this vibrant young woman, and she bitterly censures the missionary societies for sending them to the foreign field.

"Preachers who would have bored you beyond endurance," she says, "you sent cheerfully to the foreign fields; young men and women just out of college, who knew nothing, and did not even know they knew nothing, you sent to a people centuries old." She used to blame the missionaries; but not any more.

"How dared you send us so many of these little men and women?" she demands. "How dared you set them up to stand for your God, for Jesus Christ, before the world? It is a comment significant enough," she says, "that many of the missionaries of above the average ability and personality have sooner or later been driven out of the work. Questioned, they usually reply, 'It was impossible for me to do my work in that atmosphere.' You are they who keep the missionaries in terror over their statistics of church members, so that numbers come to mean to them the sole criterion whereby they judge their success."

But missions must be judged by all, not by some, of their fruits, and there were those whom Mrs. Buck "admired and loved who were perfectly satisfied with Christ, even tho the magic of superstition had been stripped from Him. There was a quality in them," she says, "I wanted for myself, a content I needed for my own heart."

"Yes, let me be just; in even those I did not admire there was a quality of sincerity in so far as they could understand, and there were morality, honesty, and simple virtues, but priceless.

I came to see there were more really good people among the Christian group than in any other, whatever their other failings. Wherever there was a sincere Christian I might find, it is true, a stupid man or an insensitive or an ignorant man, or even an arrogant man, but I found a good man in the accepted sense of the word. Here was something. It is much that a man is honest, sincere in what he believes, morally decent."

So, for all their shortcomings, Mrs. Buck would not see the missionaries withdrawn from China, and for all that the missionaries have preached about Him, she would not have the figure of Christ pass from the earth. She believes that the whole organization of foreign missions needs intelligent study, and it is probable, in the light of such study, she says, that the basis of organization must be changed.

"We must realize, we Christians," she says, "that we have scarcely begun our work in foreign lands. Christ has not become a part of the Chinese life. We can have no assurance that if we withdrew from China to-day there would be any more permanent record left of our religious presence there these hundred and fifty years than there is left of the old Nestorian Church, a wind-blown, obliterated tablet upon a desert land."

The reason for this is that "we have gone as a group of professional Christians, paid by an organization foreign to the country. We have been hopelessly handicapped by our professionalism, just as the average minister is handicapped anywhere. We have fastened upon ourselves the stigma of rice Christians, altho there are many to whom it is unjustly applied. But there is so much truth in it that it must be a consideration in any appraisal of the Christian groups."

A DIFFERENT approach is needed. The missionary must go to fill a need, not to represent a creed. This, of course, changes the whole basis of missions, says Mrs. Buck:

"It shifts the emphasis from preaching to a people to sharing a life with them, the best life we know. It seems to me this is the only possible basis for missions. It removes from us the insufferable stigma of moral arrogance, and it gives us besides a test of our own worth. Before we can share anything with benefit, we must have tried it ourselves.

"Above all, I say, then, let the spirit of Christ be manifested by mode of life rather than by preaching.

"I am wearied unto death with this preaching. It deadens all thought, it confuses all issues, it is producing, in China at least, an order of hypocrites, and in the theological seminaries a body of Chinese ministers which makes one despair for the future, because they are learning how to preach about Christianity rather than how to live the Christian life.

"I have stood here to-day speaking as one of your race and country, identifying myself also with the group you have sent as representatives of your religion to another land.

"But there is a part of me that is neither of these. By birth and ancestry I am an American, by choice and belief I am a Christian, but by the years of my life, by sympathy and feeling, I am Chinese. As a Chinese, I say to you what many Chinese have said to me:

"Come to us no more in arrogance of spirit. Come to us as brothers and fellow men. Let us see in you how your religion works. Preach to us no more. But share with us that better and more abundant life which your Christ lived. Give us your best or nothing."

Training for Marriage

"AND THEY LIVED HAPPILY EVER AFTER." So the romancers of another day. To say it now would be romancing; indeed, large percentage of the marriages performed in the United States, statistics show, are destined to end on the rocks. Supposedly trained in school and college for the responsibilities of citizenship, young men and women enter upon the most fundamental relationship of human society with practically no training at all. The love they thought perennial is found to be a fragile flower.

A shorter and easier road to the divorce court or a longer and more difficult road to the altar have been proposed, the one as a cure, the other as a preventive. But the judge still keeps pace with the minister—so many marriages, so many divorcees, and, of course, so many children of divided allegiance or of no allegiance at all.

Why not a marriage course? The Institute of Family Relations in New York, which was incorporated June 4, 1931, is trying to meet the issue, we read, by providing consultation, instruction, and advice on marriage and family problems. Its functions, related in the New York Sun, are outlined as: Promotion of happy marriages and successful parentage, prevention of unfit unions by premarital physical and mental examinations, instruction to correct all misinformation, consultation through a staff of experts, and correction of maladjustments.

In a conference of members of the Institute, participated in by Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Jewish clergymen, the Rev. C. Rankin Barnes, executive secretary of the department of Christian Social Service of the Episcopal Church, said, "all too often we have tried to prevent the break-up when it is too late. We have arrived after the lawyer. The time to begin is when the family first has a need, whether it be for an economist or for a physician. The call is no longer for a general conference, but for individual case work."

As an example of what may be done, it is pointed out that information on marriage and family life is given to prospective brides and bridegrooms of the Episcopal Church in accordance with a new Episcopal canon.

The task is primarily the minister's duty, says Dr. Sidney E. Goldstein, associate rabbi of the Free Synagog of New York. In an address before the Institute he says that "the minister, more than any other man, should feel himself responsible for the reorganization of the family on a safe and secure foundation. But the difficulty is that the ministers themselves are not only unprepared to instruct young men and women, but also seem to be unaware of their own obligation."

Marriage, says Dr. Goldstein, has ethical implications of which the civil contract is unaware, "and it is these ethical implications that the minister must place first in the performance of every ceremony."

But the Nashville Tennessean thinks the minister is busy enough as it is. What with the preparation of his sermons, calling on the sick, attending to his personal charities, officiating at Thankful for What?

By Edna Jaques

NOT for the mighty world, O Lord, tonight, Nations and kingdoms in their fearful might—
Let me be glad the kettle gently sings,
Let me be thankful just for little things.

Thankful for simple food and supper spread,
Thankful for shelter and a warm, clean bed,
For little joyful feet that gladly run
To welcome me, when all my work is done.

Thankful for friends who share my woe or mirth,
Glad for the warm, sweet fragrance of the earth,
For golden pools of sunshine on the floor,
For love that sheds its peace about my door.

For little friendly days that slip away,
With only meals and bed and work and play,
A rocking-chair and kindly firelight—
For little things let me be glad tonight.

marriages, funerals, and baptisms, etc., he hasn't much time left for other duties.

The burden, thinks The Tennessean, must eventually fall upon the schools, "and not until they have assumed that burden and have put into practise a thorough program of sex education can they say they have prepared our young people for the noblest duties it will be their lot to perform, that of bringing healthy, normal children into the world, and of being healthy, normal parents to them."

As for the ministers, they, says The Tennessean, "can render valuable service by attacking the shams and hypocrisy which have made it difficult for the schools even to contemplate the inauguration of such a plan."

A Hindu's Warning to Western Women

WHATEVER YOU DO, girls of the West, don't accept Hinduism and take a Hindu for a husband. Hinduism is no substitute for Christianity, and marriage to a Hindu has many disadvantages.

This well-meant advice comes from Pundit Bhagat Ram, "a friend of animals," and appears in the New York Christian Advocate (Methodist).

"We who have been brought up in Hinduism and live and have our being in Hinduism," he says, "have often pondered over the question why American and English ladies are now and then turning Hindus and renouncing Christianity. We can not understand why Christian women can accept Hinduism—the Hinduism which practises child marriage, enforced widowhood, untouchability, and a double standard of morality for men and women—such a system can hardly contain more spirituality than Christianity."

The pundit's article came to The Christian Advocate from the Rev. Fred M. Perrill, editor of The Indian Witness, Lucknow. Mr. Perrill observes that Gandhi has attracted many Western women as disciples, and that there is a strong appeal to them to look upon Hinduism as a great source of spirituality.

WHAT Pundit Bhagat Ram says in this regard, Mr. Perrill thinks, is very well taken. The pundit is not a Christian but a Hindu reformer who, according to the teachings of his religion, advocates the protection of all animal life. He has also been active in urging that women and girls in India be protected.

"If any Western sister is bent upon a Hindu marriage," writes the pundit, "let it be a civil marriage, not according to the Hindu rites, so that in the future there may be some way of escape." Western women, he says, never hear of Hindu laws:

"They little realize that Hinduism is an aristocracy; that it is polytheistic, dogmatic, bigoted; that it is antagonistic to the poor classes, and opposed to social reform.

"They know nothing of the deserted Hindu wives, the prejudice against girls, deprivation of women practically from any inheritance—such facts as these are never presented to foreign audiences.

"The West knows little of the real facts of thought and life which face millions of our less fortunate Hindu sisters every day of their lives under the garb of usage and customs.

"If Western ladies come to help Hindu sisters to overthrow these evils, and gain for Indian women and Untouchables their just rights as human beings, then their coming is blest. Otherwise, their coming will be of little service to their less fortunate fellow men and women, and is not likely to attain any higher end than to satisfy their own selfish desires or mere curiosity."

Referring to an American woman who had taken the vow of voluntary poverty in Hinduism, the pundit inquires whether an American or English woman has ever taken the voluntary vow of poverty in a "crusade to remove from Hinduism the woes of child marriage, deserted Hindu wives [a Hindu may desert his wife and may marry many others, but the abandoned wife remains bound by her marriage ties until death], and untouchability, or the cruelty of marrying young girls to aged, decrepit men, or polygamy, or the antipathy toward children":

"Or, has any one ever taken a vow of voluntary poverty in a crusade against, or as a protest against, the custom of selling and purchasing young brides?"

"Or, has any one ever taken such a step in protest against the pernicious double standard of morality in Hinduism, giving great laxity for the male, but the most strict and rigid standard for women?"

"Has any one ever taken such a step as a protest against the treatment of the deprent classes, and initiated a crusade to give them their elementary rights as human beings and citizens of this our native land?"

"Has any one ever taken a vow to uplift and teach the poor ignorant village women something of the elementary facts of sanitation and hygiene, and training of children?"

SUCH spirituality as is found among Hindus is not due to the Hindu religion, says Pundit Bhagat Ram, but is in spite of the teachings of Hindu philosophy. So his prayer that others may be saved from Hinduism:

"We who have been born and raised in Hinduism, and who know from bitter experience what it means for the poor, the oppressed, and the weaker sex, can desire nothing better for our sisters in Western lands than that they may be saved from the sad experiences which have fallen to our lot in Hinduism. Should any American or English lady be saved from taking such a fatal step by this leaflet, our purpose in writing it will be fulfilled."

Prayer Going to the Dogs

REYNARD HAS MOST OF THE ODDS against him as it is when the pack is out, and for the huntsmen to ask God to help the hounds seems like robbing him of even a sporting chance for his life.

A Maryland fox had this experience recently, when one of the Episcopal clergy in Washington called down the divine blessing on a pack of hounds ready for the chase. It's an old English custom, but it doesn't get much sympathy from the Baltimore Sun:

"You have some thirty hounds, backed up by mounted gentry in pink coats and bowler hats, all in pursuit of one fox. Yet it is considered sporting to add to this advantage a divine blessing upon the hounds, when strict equality would seem to demand that the fox should be blest by nothing less than a Bishop and full choir.

"It is said in defense of the present custom that the fox gets so much fun out of being hunted, and is so often successful in making idiots out of the pack by going to ground just when everybody is yelling 'Tallyho!' that to bless him as well as the hounds would make kills so rare that the hunting set would take up golf.

"Nevertheless, we instinctively feel that the fox should get at least an honorable mention in the service, if only because of his indispensability as an excuse for gentlemen to wear Sherlock Holmes caps while on horseback, and for ladies to stick pins through perfectly good high hats."

WITH which sentiments the Baltimore Southern Methodist fully agrees. Methodist preachers, it observes, have done many things they ought not to have done, and have left undone those things which they ought to have done:

"They have married couples in circus-rings, in airplanes, on the theatrical stage, in swimming-pools, and at food-shows; they have conducted mock funerals and mock weddings, and have violated all the canons of good taste in forty-eleven different ways—we even saw one take his own baby in his arms at the conclusion of a funeral once and so lead the procession out to the hearse—all these things we have done and more, too, but henceforth let no ecclesiastic high-hat us—at least we have never stood before a photographer while we asked the blessing of Almighty God on a pack of yelping foxhounds."

SCIENCE AND INVENTION

Tricks of the Firebug

"HOW DID IT START?" he asked.

"You know, because you did it," was the reply.

"What do you mean?" demanded the owner. "That fire happened this morning, and I've been out of town since yesterday afternoon."

"I'll tell you," replied the investigator. What he said is thus reported in Popular Mechanics (Chicago):

"This morning you were out playing golf, and at eleven o'clock you went to the clubhouse to make a phone call. You called your store, and as no one was there, you listened until the bell had rung fourteen times. Then you hung up and resumed your game.

"The bell-clapper of the phone in your office was tied down with a weak string that you had learned would break on fourteen rings. Just before you hung up, the clapper broke loose and struck a nail that discharged a blank cartridge that you had fastened in a wooden block. The flare from the cartridge ignited five gallons of gasoline in a glass bottle, the bottle broke under the heat, and the flaming gasoline spread over the floor and burned up your insured merchandise. Come along with me."

"This really happened. Professional firebugs and their amateur imitators have developed new and ingenious ways of creating fires in the last few years. But members of an arson squad to-day can ransack the charred timbers of a fire and tell you if it is an arson case, the sex and nationality of the criminal, the method used to start the fire, and the minute of its inception."

PAUL T. WOLFE, chief of the fire-investigation bureau in Los Angeles, who is turning arson-detection into an exact science, records some amazing cases. He says:

"Recently a fire occurred in a building ten months after the owner had locked it up and left for Europe. His timing-device went off almost at the hour he had calculated. More recently still, a firebug was able to burn down a house he had never been near simply by driving down the adjoining street.

"Ten years ago, mechanical contrivances such as clock-works were frequently used to start fires, but the twisted bits of metal remaining were so hard to explain away, that incendiaries have adopted more subtle methods. Inflammable liquids, gases, chemicals, and electricity, coupled with starting devices that practically disintegrate in the flames, are the latest tools of the professional 'torch.' The arson-squad has only one weapon, the microscope, but this is proving to be more than a match for the criminal. The microscope is a practically infallible instrument of detection.

"I'll show you how easy it is," says Mr. Wolfe. "When I go out to investigate a suspicious fire, I first locate the spot where the fire started. You can do this by tracing the cross-checks on the burned wood. When wood burns normally, the cross-checks on the charcoal have a definite size, but the checks are finer and closer together if some material that burns with a hotter flame than wood is present. Every combustible liquid leaves its own telltale marks on the wood.

"A typical trick in the past was to carry heavy insurance on a stock of expensive goods," says Mr. Wolfe. "Then the firebug would move the goods out, substitute shoddy material in their place, and start a fire. In that way he could obtain the insurance money and still own the goods. But the microscope enables us to differentiate between the burned hair and skin of an expensive fur and its charred counterfeit."

"The whole art of arson detection is based on the fact that practically every material burns at a different temperature. A gasoline flame, for instance, burns at 1,500 degrees Fahrenheit, while burning sugar creates a temperature of only 700 degrees. Each individual flame temperature leaves different microscopic marks on burned wood and on the remains of other burned materials.

"This knowledge has given the arson-squad a direct lead on the firebugs who employ chemicals to start a fire or to spread the flames. Each chemical leaves its own characteristic mark long after the fire has been extinguished. Even when a gas is used, its identity may be determined.

"As a result, 85 per cent. of arson suspects in Los Angeles in the last few years have been convicted."

Caught in Time

Two obvious firebug devices that didn't work.

Ape That Outclassed a Baby

AN ape brought up with a child in a human family is superior to her human "brother" in a number of mental tests and experiments.

The psychologist who performed the experiment, Dr. W. N. Kellogg, declared this before a meeting of the American Psychological Association in Ithaca, New York. Says Marjorie Vandewater in a wire report of Science Service (Washington):

"Motion-pictures were shown by Dr. Kellogg, professor at Indiana University, of an infant chimpanzee and human baby learning to untie knots and performing other tests of their mental development. The two had been brought up together for nine months.

"The ape learned more rapidly, remembered longer, and for the first five months responded to more words than the boy, Dr. Kellogg said. The superiority of the ape was probably due in large measure to her strictly human environment, he believes.

"Other experiments, however, reported to the same meeting by Dr. Louis W. Gellermann, of Yale University, indicate that infants and apes do differ in reasoning ability even at that early age.

"One of the tests he gave in identical fashion to two babies and two chimpanzees was to distinguish between a triangle and a square in order to secure food. Human babies have greater ability to catch on to the relationship between the correct food box and the shape of the marker placed above it, Dr. Gellermann found.

"The chatter of the babies as they puzzled over the boxes showed that they learn not alone by trial and error, but by thinking out the problem in words. This superior ability to 'verbalize' distinguishes the mentality of humans from that of apes, Dr. Gellermann indicated."

Dangerous and Wasteful Hot-Water Systems

"BLowing OFF STEAM," to relieve boiler pressure, is terribly wasteful. Why burn coal just to heat the surrounding atmosphere and use up your feed-water?

Temperature-control is now replacing pressure-relief as the modern method of reducing the hazards of overheating in all hot-water systems.

A special committee of the Hackensack (N. J.) Water Company has been investigating such installations in northern Hudson and Bergen counties.

Experience and common sense tell us that here is an outstanding instance where an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cold weather or an open window in the room where the thermostat is located. So many factors present risks in such installations that some form of temperature-controlled relief-valve should be insisted upon.

"It is recognized that old or improperly assembled hot-water plumbing installations will not, in all likelihood, be overhauled or replaced in a period of hard times.

"The problem, therefore, is that of finding a safe and inexpensive device which can be applied to any present installation. It should be operated by the water temperature at no higher than 160 degrees in the piping, either by cutting off the fuel supply, such as gas, or, if this is not possible, then to make any closed system into an open system which will be safeguarded against when the water reaches 160 degrees, and not wait until steam is being generated at temperatures of from 265 degrees up. The committee is now testing such devices."

A Roof That Needs a Lawn-Mower

IT'S A FOOL IDEA, say farmers out in Nassau County. But Louis Kofoed, placidly living under his grass-grown roof, smiles at their remarks. He says:

"A grass roof is not a fool idea, just a new idea in this part of the world. In Denmark, where I come from, there are many such roofs." We read further in the New York American:

"Kofoed is an architect. He is an authority on roofs, and of them all he has chosen for himself this roof of grass—grass growing on eight inches of sod laid on a waterproof foundation. He explained:

"It keeps rooms directly under the roof cool in summer and warm in winter. It saves space and money by eliminating the necessity for attics."

"Kofoed's wife pointed out another advantage:

"It is a pretty roof. The green looks fine against the red brick walls in summer, and the dried brown grass looks nice in winter, too."

"Mrs. Kofoed sees nothing novel in the idea, for she, too, is from Denmark—Copenhagen.

"Kofoed tends to the lawn on his roof as he does the lawn in his yard. He waters it with a special sprinkling system, and he cuts it with a small lawn-mower.

"In Denmark, Kofoed says, it would not be necessary to cut the grass, explaining:

"The goats eat the grass and keep it cut down in that way. The houses there are often built against the mountain-side, so that the goat has simply to step down off the mountain and onto the roof."

Closing Schools to Fight Scarlet-Fever

A VERY poor plan, according to the Illinois health authorities.

Sending the children home, suspending the teachers, and locking the schoolhouse doors in an attempt to suppress local epidemics is wasteful and unscientific. Says The Illinois Health Messenger (Springfield):

"A less effective method of combating an epidemic of scarlet-fever could scarcely be devised. For one thing, less than one-third of the children of school age are susceptible to scarlet-fever, so that a large majority of school children will not get it even if exposed. In the second place, children in school can be reached and control measures applied much more easily and effectively than when schools are closed. Third, closing of the schools loses whatever merit it might otherwise have, unless theaters, churches, and all other social gatherings, including sand-lot ball games, are likewise prohibited so far as children are concerned. Fourth, unless the milk sold in the community is all pasteurized, a very prolific means of spreading scarlet-fever is left open.

"The most effective, economical, and scientifically sound way of managing the schools in the face of an epidemic of scarlet-fever is based upon the following facts and observations:

"1. Susceptibility to scarlet-fever can be determined by a test.

"2. The susceptible rate is higher among children of the primary than of the upper grades.

"3. Spread of scarlet-fever can be controlled by vaccination and by quarantine.

"4. Pasteurization prevents milk from spreading scarlet-fever."

cure, says Harrison R. Cady, mechanical engineer of the company. He goes on:

"There is no reason for wasting fuel and creating a hazard by overheating water and then depending upon a neglected and too-often improperly adjusted pressure-relief-valve to safeguard the plumbing and, often, the very structure itself as well as those who dwell in it.

"The problem is not a new one, and for years the best minds in the plumbing and heating business have been evolving protective devices. The result is that there are in general use many automatic water-heating systems which leave little or nothing to be desired in furnishing safe and adequate service. These are to be discust by the committee at a later date.

"More important are the thousands of installations which are operated under varying human control, and which are not properly or safely assembled. They may be divided into three classes:

"1. Non-automatic gas heater: The danger in this system of water-heating lies in leaving the burner lighted too long while no hot water is being drawn. If such systems are of the closed type and have no safety-valve, they are extremely dangerous. If they are open systems, the expanding hot water will be forced into the street pipes through the water-meter, ruining its working parts and entailing considerable expense.

"2. Separate coal- or oil-burning hot-water-supply boilers: Such fires are open to the same objection as the hand-controlled gas heater. They cause the same trouble if neglected or forgotten.

"3. Water-heating coils or similar heating devices, placed in fire-boxes of house-heating furnaces or boilers: The varieties of these are endless; often they are designed and installed by an inexperienced plumber or by the householder. The dangers arise from having the coil too large or improperly located, or from having a hot fire in the furnace. The latter may happen through carelessness, or, in the case of an automatic furnace, from very

A Fortress of Health

A famous Medical Center in New York City

IN peace-time as well as in war-time a hospital is a fortress of health.

Our fine, modern hospitals are the richest storehouses in the world of medical knowledge and skill. They are health centers which guard the people of their communities.

While your hospital is nursing the sick and the injured, its laboratories are finding new ways to protect your health. As a result of medical research in hospitals, many diseases are disappearing.

Modern surgery, aided by skilful nursing in hospitals, restores to health tens of thousands each year.

In the past, people generally have thought of hospitals merely as the best places to which they could go in case of accident or when an operation was unavoidable. Today people are rapidly beginning to realize that the hospital is the best place in which to be in event of any serious illness.

No home, no matter how comfortable, is so well equipped to furnish the many forms of service—any one of which may be needed instantly and imperatively—as a properly conducted hospital.

People unfamiliar with the wide scope of hospital work think only of the patients in hospital beds. One great hospital in New York City treats in its clinics an average of 1400 visiting patients each day. The hospital of the future will play an even greater part in caring for the health of the people. It will be a medical center which radiates health protection.

National, State and County hospitals are supported by taxation. A few private hospitals and sanatoria are on a self-supporting basis. But the great majority of private hospitals are dependent upon endowments and sustaining contributions for bare necessities—proper equipment and needed surgical, medical and nursing staffs.

California's Plan for Lower Doctors' Bills

CALIFORNIA PUTS FORTH A CLAIM that it has solved the problem of high cost of illness.

A plan sponsored by the State Medical Association assures, so we are told, complete medical care and hospitalization to persons of moderate means.

Differing from anything hitherto attempted, payment for illness will be handled through county medical societies, co-operating with local hospitals.

The middleman's profit is cut out, together with the expense of maintaining separate insurance organizations so that service can be rendered for a nominal amount. Says Dr. G. P. Porter of the State Health Department, in a news release:

"The beneficiary would select his own physician from the

Copyright, International

The Two Heads Have Different Ideas Sometimes

membership of the county medical society. Every physician in good standing is eligible to membership. The medical care would cover all types of disease and injury.

"The patient also would select his own hospital from a list of those cooperating with the society. The hospital service would include laboratory, X-ray, drugs, dressings, operating-room, and floor-nursing, and would cover all except contagious diseases.

"The plan originated with Dr. John H. Graves, president of the California Board of Public Health. He drew up the plan, and the State Council has endorsed it and is presenting it to the various county medical societies. Each society that undertakes it will fix its own rates, and designate the maximum income it regards as constituting 'moderate means.' Persons with larger incomes will not be eligible for the service."

IN outlining the plan, Dr. Graves said:

"At the outset, all profits that would go to agencies, insurance companies, promoters, etc., are abolished. The medical profession will offer professional service to people whose income for the past year is below a certain fixed sum, for any and all types of disease and injury, where the individual is not protected under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The payments would be on a fixed annual, semiannual, or quarterly basis.

"Each county medical unit will operate as a partnership, and the division of moneys received will be on a unit basis—a fixed amount for each type of service. Such a plan definitely answers critics who claim that we are not interested in cooperative efforts of a social nature.

"To further assist persons of moderate means in meeting the expense of illness, separate and distinct from doctors' services, the partnership of the county medical society can promote a plan for hospitalization among the hospitals of their respective communities. The hospitals would form a cooperative organization offering to the public for an annual, semiannual, or quarterly fee, accommodations and service for all non-contagious diseases, and all injuries where persons are not covered under the Workmen's Compensation Act, for periods of one, two, and three months' duration.

"Rates for children and dependents, and arrangements for obstetrical service are simple matters of detail, easily settled.

"Such a plan preserves inviolate the relation of physician and patient, and distributes the cost of illness as efficiently as any insurance system. It is claimed by those who have been interested in the problem that this is the first logical solution of the question of how to place in the hands of people of moderate circumstances an easy and practical method of securing all the advantages of modern scientific medicine and surgical aid for themselves and their dependents at a cost so reasonable that it can be secured without financial hardship."

A Two-Headed Turtle

A TWO-HEADED TURTLE was recently taken to the research laboratory of the General Electric Company by F. B. Cliffe, chief statistician of the company, whose nine-year-old daughter found it near a small lake at Schenectady.

The turtle, of the snapping variety, was born September 24, along with more than a dozen normal brothers and sisters. Says Guy Bartlett of the company's News Bureau in a press bulletin:

"It was taken to the laboratory so that X-ray photographs could be obtained of the unusual reptile, and because turtles are a particular hobby of Dr. W. R. Whitney, director of the laboratory. The radiographs revealed that the turtle has a division in its spinal column, so that its two heads terminate the ends of a Y spine. Whether the turtle has two mouths to feed one stomach is yet to be determined, but it is considered probable that such is the case; as yet the turtle has not been seen to feed.

"The freak's two heads, four legs, and tail are normal in appearance, but its shell is wider than usual, humped in the middle, slightly pointed on the front end, and indented over the tail. The two heads behave normally, and it is apparent that they react independently. Each seems to control the two legs on its side of the body, for at times the turtle attempts to travel in different directions at the same time. At other times one head may be under water while the other is above, or the turtle may be sleeping with one head while wide awake on the other side. The right-hand head is slightly larger than the other, but it has not been noticed that either predominates in reaching decisions.

"Ordinarily, a turtle walks with alternate leg motions—the front right and rear left legs move forward together. The two-headed turtle has been seen to walk this way some of the time, but more frequently and with more success it progresses by moving its front legs forward at the same time."

Clean Out Your Pockets

INDICTED as the dirtiest and most germ-laden parts of human clothing, pockets in clothes are condemned by Dr. Percy Edgelow, of London, England, who advocates abolition of all present pockets in favor of removable ones, which he has invented, and which can be taken out of any garment daily or weekly and washed like a shirt or a handkerchief. Says Dr. E. E. Free, in his Week's Science (New York):

"That pockets really are intolerable germ-spreaders is agreed by experts on sanitation.

"All kinds of things are put into them—germ-laden handkerchiefs, coins, or paper money (the previous possessors of which are unknown and often unclean), dirty articles picked up on the street or elsewhere, candy or other materials providing excellent food for germs, and many others.

"Pockets almost never are turned out to be cleaned, or so that sun or air can get at them. Fastidious people, who never dream of carrying a dirty handkerchief or of wearing any article of clothing after it is soiled, may go around for weeks or months in clothing, the unseen pockets of which are literally filthy.

"Dr. Edgelow's removable pockets, advocated to remedy this condition, are small cloth sacks shaped exactly like ordinary pockets, but attached to the garment only by a series of loops and slots in the edge of the pocket and the edge of the garment where the pocket is to fit.

"A tape is laced conveniently through these loops and slits so that the attached pocket looks and feels exactly like an ordinary one. The tapes, nevertheless, can be removed in an instant, the old pocket taken out for washing or disinfection, and a new and clean one attached."

of Madrid, Spain

"She had tried everything for her skin trouble..."

DR. BRAVO, the noted skin specialist, says,
"Then I prescribed yeast*"

SKIN SUFFERERS, here's an extremely typical example of how fresh yeast acts to correct bad skin.

This case is one of many from the records of Dr. Julio Bravo, important member of the Spanish Academy of Dermatology. In his words:

"Last year an actress came to consult me with a stubborn skin disorder of the face. She told me she had tried all sorts of remedies without result.

"As the patient was chronically constipated, I advised yeast...three times a day.

"In a very short time her condition improved and the skin eruptions were arrested. I have seen this patient frequently since. She confesses that yeast has corrected her constipation and greatly benefited her health."

There's no magic about fresh yeast. It simply has remarkable powers to stimulate, "tone" and cleanse the entire system... ridding it in a natural way of the poisons that lead to complexion blemishes, poor digestion, headaches—"run-down" health.

And as you eat it the first result you notice is better elimination. That's because yeast actually strengthens your intestines, at the same time softening the wastes in your body so they can be more easily cleared away.

Won't you try it? Grocers, restaurants and soda fountains have Fleischmann's Yeast. Eat three cakes a day—one before each meal, or between meals and at bedtime—just plain, or in water (about a third of a glass).

For free booklet on Yeast for Health, write Dept. Y-DD-26, Standard Brands Inc., 691 Washington St., N. Y. C.

DR. HYNK, noted authority of the University of Bratislava, states: "Fresh yeast is universally recommended by doctors for... skin troubles... arising from putrefaction in the intestines."

(Above) "MY OWN DOCTOR advised Fleischmann's Yeast to clear the impurities from my system," writes Miss Emily O'Brien of Mt. Vernon, N. Y.

"I was suffering from indigestion—felt miserable—was sluggish—and began to have eruptions on my face. I was horrified..."

"After eating yeast ten days I had no more indigestion. No headaches. And I could hardly believe it as my complexion began to clear. My experience bears out what doctors say about yeast."

An Invitation to a German Riot

"TOMORROW MORNING AT ELEVEN SHARP" was the appointed hour.

"But you must be on time, for all our riots begin promptly."

The inviter was welcoming an old friend who had returned to the University of Berlin after an absence of sixteen months. 'Twas at the university that the riot was to be held "at eleven sharp," and the inviter's enthusiasm found expression in the remark:

"You couldn't have arrived at a better moment!"

The recipient of this warm token of hospitality was James G. Simonds, who now tells the story in The Review of Reviews and World's Work.

Germany to-day, he remarks at the outset, is "a country where everybody riots and all disorder occurs punctually."

REGIMENTED violence, mutiny by the drill-manual, insurrection with the goose-step—these are some of the paradoxical fancies evoked by Mr. Simonds's account of a riot in the University of Berlin—and such a riot, he tells us, "is one of the most worth-while sights in the Reich," for "in miniature the whole political situation of the country, the position of each party, the passion of all groups, is faithfully presented." Moreover:

Everybody is young, so there is not even the presence of age and authority to inspire respect. As for fear or reverence for law, what is one more free-for-all when your whole country is continually breaking out into violence? Therefore, university riots occur with utmost regularity, and only the week before I arrived, the whole university had been closed for four days after an unusually successful riot.

Always, too, the coming riot casts its shadow before it: for several days before the explosion the atmosphere is unpleasant. Students of the various groups—Nazis, Republicans, all the gradations of the Right and Left—glare at one another with particular hate. Then, suddenly, the pot boils over: but only at eleven o'clock in the morning. A riot that began at any other moment would not be German—not according to plan.

Precisely as the clock strikes, the big hall on Unter den Linden is something to see and hear. Students of all the Corporationen (societies), in their bright-colored and rather comic little caps, assemble in groups and begin to talk. The green hats are in one corner, the red in another. In themselves these assemblies are quite harmless; they are not even noisy. They are just business meetings of the societies, carried on as tradition prescribes. As long as politics are kept out of the discussion, peace is unbroken.

As my friend had told me, I had arrived at a lucky moment. The day before, the Government had raised the ban on the wearing of the Nazi uniforms. So when I came in, the Nazi students were parading everywhere in their brown uniforms. The arrogance of their smile and the swagger of their walk said more plainly than words: "Perhaps this place does not belong to us quite yet, but it will very soon."

Every time two Nazis met, their right hands snapt up to salute, relates Mr. Simonds, and "they thundered with unnecessary loudness the customary Heil Hitler." As for the Communists, "altho they, too, wear a uniform, and the bigger comrades greet each other with upraised fist, the insignificance of their numbers usually keeps them still." However:

This morning every one knew that peace was not for long. Almost as I entered the room, one of the Nazis—by mistake, perhaps—trod on the foot of a Jewish student. It was the expected signal: the Jewish student hit the Nazi, and in one brief second the whole hall dissolved into a free fight.

As became a neutral and a foreigner, I chose a strategic corner, and watched. First, the hall shook and rocked to the cries of Deutschland, erwache! (Germany, awake!). Then came the angrier shout: Juden verrecke! (Death to the Jews!) At this latter war-cry, the Jewish students broke and began to run, hotly pursued by the Nazis. Up and down the stairs went the fight. Jews, Communists, Reichsbanner (republicans) rallied and resisted the Nazis on the stairs. In the hall others formed new groups and sang the party songs of the Nazis, or formed Sprechkore, the German equivalent of a huddle, in which all shouted together some significant phrase or catchword.

This uproar continued unchecked for, perhaps, five minutes. Then there sounded suddenly the shrill blast of the police whistle. A few seconds later (and on time also, at 11.05 precisely) in charged the police in their trim navy blue jackets and grim black helmets. Their nightsticks—the famous gumi-knuppel of the Berlin slang—were drawn and poised. Immediately the scene changed. One moment, Nazis, Communists, and Reichsbanner fought one another furiously; the next moment there were only students, united to repel the invasion of their enemy and defend their sacred rights.

Now the whole university area rang with a new battle-cry: Schupos raus! (Out with the cops!) What had been a civil war became a national uprising. Where the Nazis had chased the Jews, the Schupos pursued both. When the Nazis were hard-pressed, Communists and Reichsbanner students thrust themselves in the pathway of the police, and Hitler's heroes made good their escape. And the Schupos, infuriated by the loss of their victims, turned upon the rescuers and gave them terrible beatings, which they took bravely. Finally, the police herded all the students in one solid group, into which I too was jammed, drove them outside the university yard, closed the gates, and mounted guard. The rioting "at eleven sharp" was over for the day.

MR. SIMONDS found it amazing to observe how commonplace the people around him considered this episode, "which in the United States could certainly have been thought extraordinary." He set out on the following night "to see the Nazis at home." Abbreviating his interesting account, we give these sample impressions:

My friend directed me to a sturm-lokal. Despite its ominous title, this "storm-center" was the most ordinary of beer saloons, distinguished merely by a huge Nazi banner—red, with a white circle in the center, in which was a swastika, the insignia of the Hitlerites. Over the bar hung a picture of Hitler himself, while before the door three Nazis in full uniform marched back and forth on sentry-go.

Hardly a minute had passed before I was aware that I was an intruder. But, having come to see, I stuck.

Soon other boys with party pins came in, and the youngest of these, surveying the room casually, nodded to the waiter and turned toward his comrades. Then his eye caught mine. He stiffened, and muttered something to his friends. Without warning, one of these stepped to the door and whistled shrilly. Promptly the three guards burst into the room, and all gathered in a group and whispered for a moment, eyes fixed upon me with undisguised hostility.

Then the boy who had given the alarm crossed over and stood stiffly above me.

"Tell me," he said, in a low, even, but deliberately hard tone, "haven't I seen you with the Communist storm troop down the street?"

LATER comes a conversation with a Nazi who looks forward to the joys of street-fighting and a Hitler triumph, followed by prosperity in a victorious Germany with no Polish Corridor. On another day Mr. Simonds visited the Red quarter, and he relates:

From Wedding Platz I wandered, for quite some time, until I found the Communist Lokal for which I was looking. It was the exact counterpart of the Nazi center, with a picture of Lenin in place of Hitler, and party posters and photographs of Russian workers on the walls. Presently, I fell into conversation with a neighbor.

"Interested in the proletarian point of view, are you?" he inquired. Then, smoothly, almost eloquently, he proceeded to tell me about the Red workers' ideals and ambitions.

"Nazis," he began, "are the last throw of the capitalistic world, driven from one bulwark to another, vainly trying to defend itself against the rising tide of class consciousness and the feelings of the workers who are being betrayed. Oh, they will not last long; they are only mercenary troops, workers who are not class-conscious, workers who are paid and armed by Heavy Industry and Big Business, seeking to defend their privileges against the just demands of the true workers. Once it really comes to a showdown, they have no spirit to carry them on. Then our workers, who are fighting for an ideal, will conquer the Nazis, who are fighting for pay."

The Crowning Grace.—A homely Scot in London was being shown the sights, and was given lunches and dinners at the best hotels. To his friend he said: "This is all very well, but what I want is something more homely, homely surroundings, simple food, and the friendly word."

He was taken to a quiet little place in Kensington for high tea with egg and bacon. "This is exactly what I want," he said to the waitress, "homely surroundings, simple food, but what about the friendly word?"

She whispered in his ear, "Don't eat the egg."—Christian Register.

Reaping the Whirlwind.—"Why are farmers dissatisfied so much of the time?"

"I suspect," replied Senator Sorghum, "that one reason is that we politicians have for so long made it our regular business to keep the farmer reminded of his troubles."—Washington Star.

The New Kind of Traffic Cop

THAT heart-sinking "putt-putt" of the motor-cycle cop's presence just to the rear left of one's automobile is heard less frequently in the land these days, says William Ullman in his Feature Service (Washington).

To many a motorist unable to detect any profound reform in his traffic morals, which makes it all the more mysterious, the every day has marveled at the brooding calmness with which the motor-cycle officer surveys the vehicular flow in contrast with his erstwhile remorseless pounce upon the offender. If he has misconstrued it to mean a weakening of the fiber of enforcement, he frequently meets the miserable awakening of being arrested some day to hear the long story of misdemeanors which he thought were unnoticed because they went unpunished. Many a driver has made, and hundreds are making daily, the discovery that the officer who never ap-physical effect of the sound, he says, has become no more than a faint memory. He goes on:

The reason for it all is not particularly mysterious, however. It merely means that traffic-law enforcement has taken another pathway; one more quiet, less harrowing upon the nervous systems of drivers, and, so its creators are convinced, one that will be more fruitful of good results.

It does not mean that the old technique of enforcement no longer applies. It does, but in addition to the actual task of snatching the reckless from the streets and highways, the traffic policeman of to-day spends more of his time in quiet investigations and studies that look toward a more sweeping and lasting contribution to public safety.

The writer recently stopt to ask a motor-cycle policeman in a State, to which his car's license tags were foreign, what was the State speed limit.

"Forty miles an hour," replied the officer.

"And if you saw me driving forty-five?" he asked.

"Well, if the road were wide and straight, traffic light, and you were remaining in the right lane and obviously attending strictly to business, I might say to myself that you were a good, careful driver."

The officer laughed. "But don't ever let me see you cross the white line, pass another car at a curve, or cut in—me or any other officer," he added with a warning, meaningful smile. It epitomizes the new attitude.

Many a motorist traveling a fixt route peared to notice him really has been a close student of his misconduct.

Wherever it started, and many are inclined to place its origin in Connecticut, the new enforcement technique now has become general. It is as much a part of the traffic scheme of things in California as in any of the eastern States.

THE new procedure gives promise of achieving its most beneficial results in those States which have driver's license laws. No longer can an operator solace himself with the opinion that it is his first offense, and he will be let off lightly. It is hard to believe in its hallowing effects after an officer has reeled off a number of others which he thought were strictly a matter between himself and his conscience. Even tho these latter breaches continue to go unpunished, the offender realizes he has not been "getting by" with them. We read further:

Traffic officials and motor-vehicle authorities report that the effect on the driver of average intelligence is to make him reflect and reform. In the words of one: "There has been a growing feeling among moto-ists that enforcement has lost its aspect of individualism; that drivers were being dealt with in the mass. It is decidedly sobering to learn that such is not the case, but that the officer has gone about the job of learning an individual's habits more studiously and slowly."

day a traffic officer rides up to a given intersection, dismounts from his motorcycle and starts dealing with traffic in the mass, does not mean that any individual driver passing that point is submerged in the total of the vehicular stream. Daily duty does not impersonalize the officer's task as much as one might suspect.

Officers have a way of spotting individual drivers and cars, of singling them out and getting to know them. According to one veteran who alternates between patrol and post duty at a busy outlying intersection in one large city: "The good ones slip back into the big stream and are forgotten, but you sort of get to know the others and they have a hard time hiding from you."

Their superiors to whom they make reports declare this "spotting" technique is common to all traffic officers. Therefore, if the individual motorist in one of his perfectly honest moments admits that he has been taking advantage of the cop, he had better reform. The chances are that the officer, too, is aware of the situation.

No "Mass Sterilization"

THE Human Betterment Foundation of Pasadena, California, writes us to deny that it advocates the sterilization of 18,000,000 of us to insure America against race degeneration, as represented in an article in our pages on August 6, founded on a statement by Paul O. Komora, Secretary of the National Committee for Mental Hygiene. Mr. Komora is mistaken, we are assured. A pamphlet issued by the Foundation and distributed at the Syracuse meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science did, it is true, say that in America there are "18,000,000 persons who are or at some time during life will be burdened by mental disease or mental defect, and in one way or another [will be] a charge and tax upon the rest of the population," and it went on to say that a community can do one of three things for the mentally diseased and mentally deficient—"do nothing at all," "keep such patients under lock and key for the rest of their lives," or "study its patients carefully and, after sterilization, release under supervision those who could get along successfully in the community if they had some help when necessary."

THE president of the Foundation, however, Mr. E. S. Gosney, avers that it does not advocate a sterilization of all of the 18,000,000, and quotes passages from other parts of the pamphlet to support his claim. He writes:

The pamphlet distributed at Syracuse states: "Sterilization should apply only to those defectives who are likely, without sterilization, to produce children which they can not care for, and who would be incapable of becoming self-sustaining, good citizens." The method of sterilization used in California unsexes no one.

This pamphlet quotes from accepted researches of others the estimate of 18,000,000 persons in this country who are or at some time in their lives will be burdened with mental disease or mental deficiency. It does not say they should all be sterilized.

"Almost Entirely a Man-to-Man Battle"

William B. Bull, telling us in the Atlanta Journal about the astonishing game he saw at the Cherokee Reservation near Lake Junaluska, North Carolina.

SOME players are knocked out. Others are worn out by their frantic battling. Consequently, there are frequent pauses to make substitutions. And for another reason: The "pants" mortality is so high that "several times the players and spectators had to group around some player who was forced to change his trunks, his first pair having given up the ghost under rough usage."

All in all, it is easy to believe the writer's assertion that "it is an elemental game," and that each participant "must have the strength of a bull, the fleetness of a deer, the keen eye of an eagle, absolute fearlessness, and a love of free-for-all fighting." And now Mr. Bull gets down to details:

There are apparently no set rules as to the number of players who engage in the game. Each team, however, must have the same number of participants as the other squad. The opposing players are paired off, a member of one team being opposed by a member of the enemy team.

Imagine a large square of fairly level grassy field. Some 1,500 spectators, nearly all Indians, are wandering around chatting, making bets, and comparing merits of the opposing teams.

Yonder is one of the teams, at the south end of the field. The players, about ten in number, are lined up abreast. Directly behind them are two men in civilian clothes who hold small trees about twelve feet high upright in their hands. The branches have been trimmed off to about two feet of the top, leaving a green tuft.

We learned that these two men are the "goal-posts." They hold the trees upright about five yards apart, the idea being to carry the ball through these posts, or to bat it through, in order to score a goal. At the north end of the field, the opposing team has lined up in the same way. It is the visiting team.

Suddenly there is a loud, weird cry from these visitors, a single voice holding a screaming note.

As it dies away all the visiting players chant what sounds like a hoarse "jug-a-rum."

These players have started moving toward the center of the field. The "goal-posts" stay where they are, but a couple of hundred of the team's ardent supporters follow close after the players.

The screaming note, followed by the hoarse chant, is repeated again and yet again until the team has moved forward some fifty yards.

And now, almost in my ear, there comes an even higher scream from just behind the spot where the Cherokee braves have been standing quietly. At the same time the Cherokee team starts its march to the center of the field, chiming in on a hoarse chant at the end of the single voice's shrill cry.

Some 500 supporters follow the team. They cover about fifty yards and then halt. The visiting team now takes up its march again.

The teams alternate, marching thus until they meet in the center of the field, still followed closely by dense crowds of partisans, who are now streaming in from the sides as well, so I join the mob in the center of the field.

AND Mr. Bull's curiosity about what the spectators were doing was soon appeased:

There was some kind of ceremony going on, accompanied by the waving in the air of various articles, such as brightly colored neckerchiefs, scarfs, pocket-knives, and other articles. It did not take long for me to realize that this was a most important phase of the game for the Indians. Each team and some of its more ardent supporters had brought things of value which they wanted to wager on their team.

A man would hold up a brilliant red scarf, gesticulating with it and extolling its praises. This would continue until somebody favoring the opposing team held up some article which was considered the equal of the scarf. Both articles would then be handed to an old Indian, who must have been highly respected, for he seemed to be the custodian of the wagers. He would throw the articles down on a central pile, and the betting would continue.

Once, two of the bettors got mad and started a fight right in the middle of the crowd, but were soon parted.

The betting occupied about half an hour; then the "spoils" were removed from the center of the field, and the game seemed about to begin.

The crowd now drew back a little to the east and west, the course being kept clear to the north and south, in order that the players might see the two goals, which must have been 200 yards apart.

The uniforms of the players were most decidedly missing—theo each man did have on a pair of very meager trunks, but they were all different colors and shapes.

Where "Play Ball" Is the Signal for One Glorious Rough-House

For that matter, they had to change players more than once for the very same reason!

Some of the players had many long scratches on their bodies. I learned that these were inflicted in various ceremonies held a day or so before the day of the game. The scratches were made with bear claws, wildcat claws, fox claws, and the claws of other animals noted for their ferocity, slyness, bravery, strength, and so on.

Each contestant was equipped with a pair of bats. I suppose they have some long Indian name, but they resemble tennis rackets. Each bat is about two and a half feet long. One end is the handle and the other end is shaped like a very small tennis racket, the face being only about as big as a man's fist, with about three wire strings parallel to the handle and three perpendicular to it. Tho the wires are taut, the bat is more like a ladle than a tennis racket, and is used as such, for the idea is to pick up the ball between the bats and run with it through the enemy's goal-posts. Sometimes, however, the ball is batted.

AND now Mr. Bull gives us a picture of the wild battle that followed—

Two huge Indians are standing facing each other in the middle of the field, much after the fashion of two big basket-ball centers waiting for the referee to toss up the ball between them. Both Indians are giants, but the C. R. (Cherokee Reservation) "center" seems to be far too fat to play any kind of ball game. However, it turned out that he had probably the greatest strength of any player on the field.

The other players are standing about in pairs, there seeming to be no set formation. The ten or so pairs covered about the area of a basket-ball court, some within a yard of the spectators. There are five or six standing around holding long switches in their hands.

Now the referee is handing the ball to the Cherokee "center." The ball they are using for this game is smaller than a golf-ball, is black, only approximately round, and is of very lively rubber.

The big fat Cherokee Reservation Indian tosses the ball up into the air and swings his bats, held together in one hand, at the ball. The visiting center immediately tried to hit the ball, too. At the same time he was evidently trying to push the fat man, to pull him, to trip him, to hit him on the head with his bats, to kick him in the shins.

The fat boy hit that little ball about ten yards toward the goal in spite of the interference of his opponent, and then immediately grabbed hold of his "partner" (or "personal enemy"), rolled him on the ground, and sat on him!

The ball was rolling along the ground all this time. Three or four of the men with the long switches ran along after it, pointing at the ball with their switches. So—that was what they were for!

One player on each side is a white man, "apparently without the least Indian blood in him," altho "only men with at least one-sixteenth Indian blood are allowed to participate." But back to the game—

Suddenly a visiting player breaks away from the C. R. white man, and runs quickly toward the ball. But the white man is hot after him, and, just before the Indian gets to the ball, the white man trips him and grabs up the ball in his bats, but before the white man can get fairly started toward TRYING to make the old car a new car is more often extravagance than economy. Repairs, replacements and depreciation are liabilities that grow larger as old cars grow older.

Thousands of motorists today are fooling themselves in the belief that by keeping the old car in service a while longer they will save money. Pending the time when they see the wisdom of the penny-wise and pound-foolish adage, thousands of willing men will be standing outside factory gates, desperate in their plight, while thousands of others who are dependent upon them suffer.

CHRISTMAS!

CHRISTMAS lists are long and budgets short. But good taste forbids gifts that look "cheap." What to do?

You'll find two easy answers at the top of this column. Genuine Telechron Clocks never sold for so little before. They're made to traditional Telechron standards. They're worthy of your closest friend or richest uncle.

Telechron, of course, is the pioneer self-starting, synchronous electric clock. Plugged into an A. C. electric outlet, it teams with the Telechron Master Clock in the power house to deliver true time to any one who needs it—and who doesn't?

Christmas is just around the corner. So is a Telechron dealer. He has a richly varied stock, priced from $3.95 to $17.50.

The Revere Clock Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, manufactures strike and chime clocks with Telechron motors, priced from $21.50 to $660.

the goal, the Indian has tackled him good and hard. That tackle shook the ball loose from the white man's bats, but neither he nor the Indian seemed to know it.

In the meantime, some of the other players had managed to knock the ball away, and the scene of action had shifted until it was some fifty yards distant. But this white man and the Indian were battling about in the dirt.

One of the Indian spectators stepped close, got their attention, and then pointed down the field where the other players were rushing after the little rubber ball. The two fellows quit fighting immediately, the white man got up and pulled the Indian to his feet. They put their arms around each other and limped off down the field, panting, but smiling.

The players often lose their bats in the superhuman scraps they engage in, so there are a couple of "bat boys" who run about collecting the bats from the ground and returning them to their owners. It seems that a goal is no good, unless the ball is carried or batted through the goal-posts with the bats.

Now the ball is on the ground and several of the ball hawks are standing around shaking their switches at it to show the players where it is. Ten pairs of players are struggling with each other—no man being nearer than ten yards to the ball. Finally, one player manages to edge close enough to the ball to grasp it, but his "partner" promptly throws him to the ground and struggles with him. When this happens, the ball being kept out of play too long by the two men, one of the referees taps the men none too gently and they stand up. The one with the ball throws it up and both men try to hit it, as at the start of the game.

Sometimes the ball is struck right into the crowd. The spectators scatter like frightened quail, and nobody can blame them, for the way some of those Indians tear after the ball is a caution! All the ball hawks run after the ball at once, in order not to lose it.

Tho the opposing team seemed to be in far better condition, the Cherokee Reservation braves appeared to have greater ability at this rough-and-tumble game. (I should explain that all the Indians really live in the Cherokee Reservation, but the team I have been calling the "C. R." aggregation was from the town of Cherokee, where the schools and other community centers of the reservation are situated.) Six times in the first half-hour the C. R. team scored goals, while the other team was being held (very literally) to none. The C. R. white man seemed to be the most skilled player on the field, for he scored three of these first six goals. One particularly brilliant play was executed by him with the help of the big, fat center of his team.

The two centers had fallen down on the ball about seventy yards from the visiting team's goal, and, as has been described before, they were ordered to stand up and swat at the ball when it was tossed up. The fat Indian had the ball; he threw it up and managed to get off a good swat. The ball traveled high into the air and just a little bit to one side of the goal.

The C. R. white man and his "partner" were playing quite close to the centers when this play started. At about the same time the big center started to swat the ball, the white man did some kind of a trick to his enemy and broke loose, running down the field toward the goal. He looked up and saw that the ball would probably miss the goal. Going full speed he got under the ball, caught it cleverly in his small pair of bats, and sidestepped quickly through the goal for the prettiest play of the day.

His "partner" just missed stopping him before he got through the goal. As soon as they saw that their star player had broken loose, the rest of the C. R. team held on to their own partners with increased fervor. Truly, almost entirely a man-to-man battle. Talk about forward passes! I've never seen anything prettier on a football field.

The First "Roorback"

A CURIOUS incident in American history and the origin of one of our political idioms, remarks the New York Times, were recalled in connection with the Presidential campaign.

Thus, "some one set the rumor rolling that 35,000 people who had voted for Roosevelt in the LITERARY DIGEST poll had written in asking that their ballots be changed in favor of Hoover. This THE LITERARY DIGEST promptly denied, saying: 'An old-fashioned political roorback has come out just in time to be nipt before election.'

"What a roorback is," The Times continues, "becomes clear when the history of the term is remembered," and we read on:

The first roorback was perpetrated in 1844 during the campaign between Polk and Clay—that is to say, at a time when elections were more like football games than debates. It consisted of a letter printed in an abolitionist newspaper, and designed to show that Polk branded his slaves with his initials as if they were so many cattle.

The authority quoted for this statement was a book which had "received the approbation of every American critic," namely, Roorback's "Tour Through Southern and Western States in the Year 1836." Its veracity could not be doubted, the letter-writer pointed out, since Roorback was recognized as an authority; he was a foreign observer with no personal interests and no friends to flatter, and he had written long before Polk had been nominated for the Presidency.

Published first on August 21, 1844, in the Ithaca Journal, this letter was promptly reprinted in other abolitionist organs and as promptly denounced by Polk supporters. The editor of The Journal was attacked viciously; he retaliated by initiating libel suits. Roorback's "tour" began to be widely discussed. In fact, the extraordinary success of the hoax—for, of course, it was a hoax—led to its exposure.

Polk's friends disclosed that the alleged quotation from Roorback's "tour" had been lifted from George William Featherstonaugh's "Excursion Through the Slave States," an authoritative work which had been published a short time before. After giving verbatim Featherstonaugh's description of the encampment of a slave-trader the author of the letter to the Ithaca Journal had added: "Forty of these unfortunate beings had been purchased, I was informed, of the Hon. J. K. Polk, the present Speaker of the House of Representatives, the mark of the branding-iron, with the initials of his name on their shoulders, distinguishing them from the rest."

After this revelation the whole "villainous forgery" was investigated, the editor of the Ithaca Journal being exonerated and the letter discovered to be the work of a locofoco officeholder. But by that time Roorback's renown had been established, and his name had become a synonym for political forgery or fiction.

As for the roorbacks themselves, we are told that American history records some famous instances. The example quoted by The Times has also been classed as a boom-erang, and, more specifically, a "burchard," after its author. As we read on:

Blaine probably lost the Presidency because he was unjustly charged with calling the Democrats "the party whose antecedents have been Rum, Romanism, and Rebellion."

Actually, Blaine never used or approved the famous three political R's. They originated with a certain Rev. Mr. Burchard, spokesman for a large group of clergymen. But Blaine's denials were useless.

Vermont's Short Way With Bobcat Racketeers

VERMONT is no place for the busy, ingenious racketeer.

The Green Mountain State has been in a ferment recently "over revelations concerning the fraudulent collection of bounty on bobcat pelts."

And not only is Vermont all stirred up. This pugnacious little Commonwealth has been doing something to mend the situation.

At the next session of the Legislature, says an editorial in the New York Sun, "the bounty law may be repealed." Reading on:

At present the State pays $10 to every citizen who presents the skin of a bobcat at the office of the town clerk of his own town, and makes under oath the declaration required by law. The bounty act has been popular, for almost every Vermonter is an occasional hunter; his favorite game is the ruffed grouse, known all through the north country as the partridge. Bobcats slaughter partridges in great numbers.

A vulnerable feature of the law is that after a man has killed a bobcat and has collected his bounty, he is permitted to take the pelt away with him. The town clerk punches holes in the bobcat's ears, but the art of mending these punctures has been developed to a high degree. Even in cases where the ears have been cut off new ears have been known to appear. The fact that the racketeers have been able to deceive sharp-eyed Vermont town clerks, many of whom probably were hunters themselves, is sufficient proof of their skill.

A man suspected of practising these tricks was captured recently, and the hand of the law descended heavily on him. Altho a resident of Plymouth, he was accused of having collected $20 on two bobcat pelts from the town clerk of Londonderry, a woman, after swearing that he was a resident of Londonderry.

He was indicted for perjury and convicted by a jury in the Windham County Court at Newfane. Judge John S. Buttles sentenced him to serve not less than two and a half nor more than four years at hard labor in the State prison, and to pay a fine of $100. He appealed and was released on $2,500 bail.

A COLD PASSES THRU 3 STAGES

And It is Far Easier Relieved in the First than in the Second or Third Stages!

A COLD ordinarily progresses through three stages: The Dry Stage, the first 24 hours; the Watery Secretion Stage, from 1 to 3 days; and the Mucous Secretion Stage. Once a cold gets beyond the first stage it is far more difficult to relieve.

Fourfold Effect for Immediate Relief

The wise thing to do when you feel a cold coming on is to take Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine.

Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine stops a cold quickly because it does the four necessary things. It opens the bowels. It kills the cold germs and fever in the system. It relieves the headache and grippy feeling. It tones the entire system and fortifies against further attack. That is the treatment you want—complete, thorough and effective. Anything less is toying with a cold.

Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine is absolutely safe to take. It contains no narcotics and produces no bad after-effects. Every drug store in America sells Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine. Handy, pocket-size box, cellophane-wrapped. Get a box today and keep it handy as the "stitch in time."

GROVE'S LAXATIVE BROMO QUININE

Business Is Swell—North of 63

IT'S just another Main Street—the Arctic seacoast.

It is not at all "a wild and woolly waste, full of uncivilized Eskimos who go about grunting gutturals and chewing on blubber as they dodge the wily polar bear."

To-day they're bargain hunters. And the coast-line of northmost Alaska is "just another Main Street where they like their radios, their flash-lights, their portable phonographs, their combs, and their cigarets.

"A Main Street far removed from the blare of traffic with rumbling street-cars and raucous horns, but with all the elements of any old Main Street in anybody's home town. The adventures, the thrills, and the perils of the region that have been novelized and filmed are no more."

So writes Alan Sherwood in the Seattle Sunday Times, telling us of the experiences of youthful Capt. John Backland, Jr., skipper of the four-masted schooner C. S. Holmes and president of the Midnight Sun Trading Company.

"And Captain Backland brings with him news of the one place in the world where there apparently has been no depression—northmost Alaska.

"The bears up there are not of the stock-market variety as they go up and down the ice-floes. Silver and white foxes, martens and minks don't have to worry about quotations or gold standards. Native Eskimos must eat, so the trading business on the Alaska coast has remained good."

WHAT does the bargain-hunting Eskimo like best in exchange for his pelts and whalebone? Well—

Most interesting among the trends toward modernity noticed by traders in Eskimo waste from the St. Lawrence to Barrow is the terrific consumption of phonograph records and portable phonographs.

Backland took 1,000 records and several phonographs, large and small, with him on this year's trip, and they went like hot-cakes. There is a taste growing for radios, slowly but surely, Captain Backland reports, and he expects to take more than ever with him next spring.

Radio reception during the far-North summer is the best in the world, German stations coming in with particular clarity; but the long winter nights and action of the Aurora Borealis render it negligible in winter. And the more tubes an Eskimo's set has, the better he will like it. Tonal quality means little.

As the popularity of phonographs increased, one of the oldest staples of the trader's cargo, glass beads of many hues, went completely out of demand. Captain Backland has discontinued carrying them this last two trips. And it was right at this point that your observer got laughed at, loudly and long. I asked the captain how much carved ivory he bought from the Eskimos during this past season's trading. He looked at me with a peculiar expression for a moment and then laughed.

"Why, I still have last year's supply of uncut ivory on hand. You see, this year the Chinese have been so busy cutting and getting cut up by the Japanese that they haven't had time to carve up the ivory tourists buy in Alaska as examples of Eskimo culture. That market has collapsed altogether." Was my face red!

There's a little table out in the mess hall next to the captain's cabin where the Holmes's trading is transacted. The trader allows the Eskimos the run of the ship with the exception of his quarters. The business of trading consists simply of a native laying his skins or baleen on the table, Captain Backland telling him what they're worth, and issuing the required staples in return.

The Eskimo squaw allows her man to do the trading and buy the sugar and flour, but she reserves the right to pick out the calico in the color scheme she fancies, and steps in with loud protest if she thinks her husband is making a mistake in the price he is about to accept. And usually, the captain amusedly explains, the calico which strikes her fancy is the one at the bottom of the pile.

SUGAR and outboard motors, canned goods, cloth, guns, and stoves are among the thousand and one items carried by the trading ship, for it must supply everything to last the Eskimo village through the year—

Introducing new things to an Eskimo buyer is the toughest job Captain Backland has experienced. He claims for the Eskimo a sales resistance that would gladden the heart of any demon "go-getter." The quickest way to introduce anything new is to let the native see the trader using it, he has found. Thus, this past trip, when Captain Backland wanted to introduce a new brand of cigarets which would allow him a greater margin of profit, he first allowed the natives to see him smoking them himself and left his package on the trading table so they could try them out.

One curious native found that the tobacco was stronger than that he had been using, and the stampede for the new brand was on, with the result that there was only one carton left in ship's stores when the Holmes pulled out for home.

Similarly, a rifle from the captain's own gun rack seems a far superior weapon to any that comes out of a case, a trade fact Captain Backland learned early in the game. Now nearly all rifle sales are made from the captain's private rack.

ALTHO staple prices along the Arctic coast are virtually double what they are in the States—"don't take that as a hint and rush out to buy a schooner and enter the Alaska trade," Mr. Sherwood advises. Because those in the business find that after freight, dockage, storage, stevedoring and insurance charges are paid, little profit remains—

In the north a prime raw white fox pelt is worth, approximately of course, and dependent upon the fur-market prospectus three months in advance, forty pounds of coffee.

Flour brings $1.50 to $2 a sack, and sugar, surprisingly, is down to 3 and 5 cents a pound. Calico—and all kinds of cloth regardless of color and weave, are known as calico—is priced higher proportionately than anything else.

Conversely, if you wish a safety-razor blade, the trading-post will supply you for far less than your local drug store.

Credit business, once the bane of the trader's existence because the Eskimo never could understand interest, and wouldn't pay it, has been virtually eliminated by Captain Backland.

The Eskimo is rapidly catching the Western idea of bargain sales, and more and more each year he waits until the Holmes is about ready to begin her homeward trip. The cargo is just about gone and the trader wants to get rid of all broken lines of goods. The natives know they will be able to buy these at bargain prices.

What Makes Luck?

A POWDER-HOUSE blew up in Vermont, and nine persons were injured. In one home, however, "a sheet of plaster fell across the crib of a four-year-old boy, protecting the child from a shower of glass and splinters which followed the blast."

A New York Sun editorial, "Puppets of Chance," reports this strange prank of fate in a discussion of a number of inexplicable incidents that seem to have been governed by "luck."

In another accident it was the falling body that was saved by a lucky circumstance, The Sun continues. "A baby climbed through the bars of a second-story porch, fell eighteen feet to the paved yard and landed unhurt on the backs of two sleeping dogs.

"An escape even more extraordinary, because of the number of persons involved, occurred, in April, 1931, in Otter Lake, Michigan. During funeral services the floor of the church collapsed, dropping the entire congregation of 250 into the basement. Nobody was injured; the part of the floor on which rested the coffin remained in place." However:

For every fortuity in which the principals are lucky, however, another case equally odd can be cited to add to the score of the gods of ill luck. An unusual example appeared in the news a few days ago. An excursion train bound from Boston to New York passed an express headed the opposite way. A steam plug on the locomotive of this other train blew out and a jet of hot vapor broke forty windows in the excursion train, injuring slightly a number of passengers.

Another accident in which a difference of seconds counted for much happened on a building job in Queens. A ten-ton coping stone just laid in place on the sixth floor fell and carried down to the street a scaffold holding three workmen, all of whom were killed. The wreckage missed a pedestrian, but crushed the dog he was leading.

In Attica, New York, a woman went to the front door of her home to call her pet cat. As she opened the door a motor-truck out of control came down a hill and crashed into the front of the house, killing the woman.

Last May a woman in Chicago attempted suicide by gas in the kitchen of her home and caused an explosion which killed a man who was passing the house. The woman was only slightly hurt.

LaSalle Extension University, Dept. 11 52-LA, Chicago

California, was flying a kite when the string got tangled in a 60,000-volt power line. The resulting short circuit burned through the wire; the loose end knocked the hat from a passer-by, bored through the asphalt pavement, and cut open a large gas main, which immediately roared into flames.

THEN we hear of a bird which picked up a lighted cigaret, carried it to a nest beneath the eaves of the City Hall in Melrose, Massachusetts, and set the building afire. This chapter of strange accidents continues:

Sparrows nesting in the roof of a house in San Antonio, Texas, used matches as well as twigs to build their nest, and started a fire by their scratching.

In Eldorado, Kansas, a farmer was shearing a mule; a biting fly caused the mule to kick, the shears were driven into the man's arm, and he died from the wound.

In Billings, Montana, a farmhand was kicked by a horse and fell against a pitchfork, which wounded him fatally.

One accident caused another in the case of a man in Fond du Lac, Wisconsin. While driving an automobile he collided with two other cars, but was not injured. The following night he dreamed of the crash, jumped from the bed in his sleep and rammed his hand through a window. No doubt he is among those who insist that hard luck comes in bunches to folks pursued by a jinx.

To Keep Sugar Soft

THE housewife's trouble with lumpy sugar may soon be a thing of the past. Science has found a substance which, added in the manufacture of sugar, prevents lumping and caking.

This same substance, calcium phosphate, provides the elements essential for the development of bones and teeth.

In a paper presented before the American Chemical Society at Denver, H. V. Moss, Chief Chemist of the Provident Chemical Works at St. Louis, told of his search for a suitable material that would overcome the objectionable tendency of sugar to form hard cakes under certain atmospheric conditions. He finally discovered that calcium phosphate, used for many years to prevent the caking of table salt, was equally useful in sugar. Mr. Moss said, as reported in a press account:

The addition of 1 per cent. of tricalcium phosphate completely prevented the formation of lumps in powdered sugar on standing for fifty-three days under the normal summer conditions prevailing in St. Louis.

Unusually free-flowing properties are imparted to sugar by the addition of calcium phosphate. Tests showed that the phosphated sugar flowed more freely than did pure sugar, and much more freely than sugar conditioned in the ordinary manner with starch. There is no tendency for the sugar to cling to the container, and it can be measured and mixed more easily.

CURRENT POETRY

UNSOLICITED CONTRIBUTIONS TO THIS DEPARTMENT CAN NOT BE RETURNED.
UNPUBLISHED POETRY UNAVAILABLE

THE Sanger Herald (California) prints a poem for Armistice Day from a new angle. It is not the dead who are mourned but those who have been denied life:

THE UNBORN OF YOUR DEAD

THOUGHTS ON ARMISTICE DAY, 1931

BY MAXWELL W. ALLEN

We are the Ones who might have been,
The Sons of those who bled,
The countless Daughters never seen,
The Unborn of the Dead!

Here is the boy who should have been—
You see him not, yet he is here
As he took form that cannot change,
An image in a brain that died
Between two searing bursts of flame.
A child all straight and brave and fine—
Had you not called, oh Land! And War!
Had guns not roared, had hate not killed,
Had Life gone on in sweet relay
Of Peace, and Home, and Her, and Love!

You see her not, but there she is,
Undestined to exist for you,
Visioned all sweet amid the stench
Of death, by him to whom Death came.
For she is fair beyond your dream—
As fair to him as she who waits
For him who died that night in France.
You see her not, nor will you see
Her stalwart sons who could have been,
Her daughters born to other men!

Yes! Praise your sons on land and sea,
And sing the price they paid!
We are your price of victory—
The Unborn of your Dead!

ALAS for the writer. A song in any other voice would be but croakings of a magpie. From The Southern Literary Review (Atlanta):

FAME

BY CLARENCE L. HAYNIE

The prima donna sings a lyrical
Refrain, and myriad voices praise her name
Beyond the glory of the kings;

Yet I who wrought this lovely miracle
Am passed unnoticed by the voice of fame—
I only wrote the songs she sings!

A song of regret for the withdrawing summer, in the Chicago Daily News:

TRANSITION

BY LUCILE LEECH

So hushed was the imperious summons that
The summer had already fled
Before we sensed her muted song or heard
The echo of her muffled tread.

And yet with all her languorous loveliness
By devastation's breath unswept,
Awareness of impermanence and change
Into her idyll might have crept.

For even flawless skies a warning hold!
I watched a white cloud drift one day
Across its field of blue to hover like
A pall above a stream at play.

Soon to be vanquished, the last verdure but Awaits the autumn's avid fire.
Unquenched, the spirit of the summer's dream
Rises above her kindling pyre.

VERSE recurrent from a long-past age. Two Tudor poets, probably unsuspected by most, emerge from obscurity in "The Oxford Book of Sixteenth Century Verse," chosen by E. K. Chambers (Oxford University Press, New York):

THE HOLLY

BY KING HENRY THE EIGHTH

Green groweth the holly; so doth the ivy.
Though winter blasts blow never so high,
Green groweth the holly.

As the holly groweth green,
And never changeth hue,
So I am, ever hath been
Unto my lady true;

As the holly groweth green
With ivy all alone,
When flowers cannot be seen
And green wood leaves be gone.

Now unto my lady
Promise to her I make
From all other only
To her I me betake.

Adieu, mine own lady,
Adieu, my special,
Who hath my heart truly,
Be sure, and ever shall!

THE VIRGIN QUEEN

BY QUEEN ELIZABETH OF ENGLAND

"When I was fair and young, and favour graced me,
Of many was I sought, their mistress for to be;
But I did scorn them all, and answered them therefore,
'Go, go, go, seek some otherwhere,
Importune me no more!'

"How many weeping eyes I made to pine with woe,
How many sighing hearts, I have no skill to show;
Yet I the prouder grew, and answered them therefore,
'Go, go, go, seek some otherwhere,
Importune me no more!'"

THE suspicion does not seem to die that the gods still consort with mortals as in days of old Homer. This in the "Conning Tower" of the New York Herald Tribune holds to the belief:

BY-BLOW

BY GWENDOLYN HASTE

Did Pan come out of the cowshed
And clip your mother one night
When she lingered a bit at the milking
While the moon was heavy and bright?

For you never stemmed from your father,
And only a god could twist
The stupid blood of your mother
To this child of cedars and mist.

Pan flees always from cities,
But still his hoofs must clear
The fragrant drift of the plowland
Hunting Arcadian cheer.

So once in a while a farmer
Shall look in a sluggish wonder
On the flashing hair of a godling
With eyes the color of thunder.

The GARGLE THAT PURGES MOUTH AND THROAT

LAVORIS is especially valuable as a gargle for sore throat because of its unique mouth-purging action. It coagulates germ-laden mucus... flushes out embedded bacteria that ordinary antiseptics do not reach, and leaves the mouth and throat in a clean and healthy condition.

Lavoris positively will not injure delicate membrane. Its effect is stimulating. Its taste is pleasant.

INVESTMENTS AND FINANCE

Economics of a Wine-Beer Comeback

THE AGITATION FOR LEGALIZING the sale of light wines and beer leads one of our great banks to consider the economic effects of such a step.

The Index, published by the New York Trust Company, recalls the assertion frequently heard wherever wets foregather, "that prosperity would follow in the wake of a return to the legalized sale of light wines and beer."

We hear talk of a billion dollars more in Federal and State taxes, of two million men being put back to work, of more money going to the farmer for his grain and grapes, and of the investment opportunities involved in the capitalization of the revived industry. In the light of all this, The Index thinks it worth while to check up on the subject, reminding us that it is "concerned solely with the economic aspects of this complex and many-sided question."

At the very beginning it is pointed out that even the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment would not necessarily legalize the sale of wine and beer in all the forty-eight States, since nearly two-thirds of them have Prohibition laws of their own.

Next we come to Federal taxes, and here The Index thinks that the return of light wines and beer would have its greatest effect. Until we had Prohibition the taxes on alcoholic beverages were a large and dependable source of revenue. The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment has estimated that Federal revenue from liquor taxes would amount to $1,000,500,000 for the fifteen States where the sale of liquor formerly was legal—this including all alcoholic beverages. Even higher estimates have been made. But The Index recalls that in no year prior to 1920 did the Federal income from taxes on alcoholic beverages reach any such proportions. The revenue from this source was $443,840,000 in 1918, and $483,051,000 in 1919. In each case about one-fourth of this revenue came from fermented liquors.

AND speaking of consumption, figures gathered by the United States Brewers Association have estimated our potential beer consumption at 50,000,000 barrels a year. This estimate does not seem to The Index so very far out of the way. Now "with a tax of six dollars a barrel on beer (the rate when Prohibition went into effect) which might prevail until Congress should enact a new rate, the revenue from a production of 50,000,000 barrels would amount to $300,000,000 a year, an amount equal to about 10 per cent. of the annual Federal internal revenue collection."

State revenues to be derived from wine and beer are even harder to estimate than Federal, we read:

Were some type of government sales to be adopted, as now prevails in the Canadian provinces, profits from retail sales would go to the States.

If a type of State-monopoly system were adopted, with private limited dividend company operation, the profits above the limited dividend would go to the States.

In 1928, nine Canadian provinces, with a population of approximately 9,000,000, collected about $23,000,000 from liquor sales. Mr. John C. Gebhart, Director of Research of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, estimates that, on this basis, the seventeen "wet" States would collect about $150,000,000 a year.

Another possible source of revenue might be the sale of licenses, probably by local governmental units, to establishments selling these beverages at retail.

How about savings and enforcement costs? In 1930 it cost nearly $35,000,000 for Federal enforcement of Prohibition. In 1931 the estimated cost is $51,000,000, from which fines aggregating $5,000,000 should be subtracted, leaving the net cost of enforcement around $46,000,000. But—

The cost of Federal supervision, which would be required in the event of repeal, would depend on the machinery necessary to control liquor traffic and to collect taxes under a new law. There is no way of estimating this cost and, therefore, the possible saving over and above the present cost of enforcement is not determinable.

And now we come to the effect on employment. To quote:

Available evidence does not indicate that either outright repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment or modification of Prohibition would create a new industry. Such change would replace a decentralized, inefficient, and costly illegal industry with a coordinated, efficient, and economical legal industry. Honest jobs would replace criminal occupations.

BUT the actual number who would be put back to work is relatively small, The Index estimating that, "the total number furnished employment by the industry, excluding those engaged in the production of distilled liquors, did not exceed 250,000" in the years before Prohibition. But there would be a temporary stimulus to employment—

Fewer than 200 breweries of the 1,100 in active operation in 1918 are legally operating to-day. Consequently, it would probably require the services, for a short time, of thousands of carpenters, painters, mechanics, electricians, plumbers, and laborers to recondition and reequip the 900 plants which have been standing idle or have been devoted to other use.

"What is more, the return of light wines and beer would probably be no more of a panacea for agriculture than for employment," we read on. The point here is that, "even before Prohibition less than 2 per cent. of the total grain crop was required in the manufacture of spirits and beer." There would, of course, be a considerable revival in the barley and hops markets.

When it comes to the need for capital, it is pointed out that the investment in plants for the manufacture of beer, wine, and spirits in 1914 amounted to nearly a billion dollars. No figures are available for the considerable investment in retail establishments. But "almost all the former beer-brewing property remains in the hands of the original owners." Therefore—

The investment possibilities are not so great as they would be if many wholly new plants would be required. It is estimated that a revival of the legal sale of beer would necessitate an investment of about $200,000,000 for the rehabilitation of the industry.

THE legalization of wine making, it is thought, would not require any great capital investment.

But a restoration of the legal status of wine and beer would stimulate other industries, it is pointed out:

Some of the industries and trades directly affected would include bottling plants, cooperage plants, plants manufacturing brewing and distilling apparatus, delivery trucks, railways, and makers of refrigerating machinery. On the other hand, the legalization of alcoholic beverages might conceivably result in a loss to some industries, as, for example, soft drinks.

Hotels, restaurants, and similar establishments might be expected to benefit from a revival of the legitimate sale of alcoholic beverages.

Moreover, real-estate values, in many instances, have suffered through padlocking of properties under Prohibition. It has been estimated that the loss in rental resulting from padlocking of properties since 1920 amounts to more than $60,000,000.

Summarizing the findings, then, we have it all here in a nutshell:

In recapitulation—from the most conservative standpoint—agriculture would benefit but slightly, while the number of men to whom employment would be furnished would, in all probability, be much smaller than is indicated by many widely circulated estimates, altho some employment would be furnished in rehabilitating the industry. Demand for some two hundred million dollars' worth of equipment might prove to be a stimulant to business, but the chief economic benefits probable from the return of light wines and beer would be the provision of additional substantial and dependable sources of Federal and State revenues together with the replacement of a decentralized and uneconomic illegal industry by a coordinated and efficient legal industry.

To Business—"Face the Facts"

BUSINESS managers "are merely riding for a later fall" if they do not face the facts—even tho the worst of the depression may be passed.

Too many corporations, says the writer of the current Ernst & Ernst Bulletin, are finding it "inconvenient and disconcerting to recognize sharply that the values which formerly existed do not exist." But this is the one thing that must be done in order that a business can make the most of what it has for the future.

Nothing can be lost by a definite writing down of values, says the writer for this accounting firm.

After all, "a dollar earned in 1933 is more important than a dollar lost in 1932." This is the point: "It is to 1933 and subsequent years that business should now look, and everything which harasses the future prospect of profitable operations should be cut off and left in the wake."

There are to-day "not merely one nor one hundred, nor one thousand, but literally tens of thousands of corporations" in a position to operate with fair assurance of profit if their managers are willing to do business on actually existing levels, and forget about the old days that have gone for good. As we read on:

A company suffers, perhaps, from what it calls "over capacity." It has too much plant, too large facilities, too high values, to be carried by currently available business.

Some of the current excess may be justified; the low volume of business and the unprofitableness of business will not always continue what it is to-day. Too many managements, however, still have their minds on the volumes of 1927-28-29. Or, even if they accept the probable fact that a return to those levels is not within sighting distance, they postpone the ordeal of acquainting owners with the facts.

Thus the overcapacity becomes a dead load which saps the vitality of that portion of the business which is alive. The dead portion should be cut off and thrown away, if necessary.

The part of the plant which is idle beyond all reasonable hope of future activity is the most expensive part of the whole organism. With it, there can be no profits for the whole. Without it, there may be profits on the remaining live portion, if properly valued.

There may be savings in such specific items as taxes, insurance, and depreciation charges. These savings may represent the margin between profit and loss.

FOR one thing, a write-down of assets "compels the owners to recognize in one dose the losses which otherwise they would be forced to accept in numerous small doses." For another, "managements need the encouragement which will flow from balance sheets representing actualities."

And when it comes to credit, the banker is likely to appreciate a balance sheet which has been correctly deflated. As the writer continues:

To hope that the development of favorable conditions will make unnecessary the reorganization of financial structure is to perpetuate the mistakes of the past.

The depression is due to a long series of mistaken judgments. When past mistakes have reached the point where it appears that there is nothing to do about them except to worry about them, then it is time to wash them out, abolish the worry, and devote the effort to future building.

The proper time for this has passed long ago.

The reason why the point needs reemphasis at this time, however, is that the slight upturn in business has the effect of reviving worn-out hopes in the minds of some managements.

Voluntary reorganizations, initiated by managements themselves, represent painful steps, but they are less painful than compulsory creditors' committees or receiver-ships.

It is not too early to see that many reorganizations will be inevitable in 1933. If they are tackled with intelligence, they will be good. The individual unit will be improved, and the whole fabric of business will be strengthened.

Already there are plenty of signs that business volume and profits eventually will come back to satisfactory levels. The speed of this recovery depends quite largely on how each unit in the whole scheme of things manages its own affairs. Already in 1932 there has been great progress in corporation reorganization.

False Hopes in Liquor Stocks

HIGH PRESSURE stock salesmen who have been peddling beer stocks on the ground that the Eighteenth Amendment will be repealed, or at least that the Volstead Law will be modified in short order, are being roundly denounced as racketeers by the Better Business Bureau.

And this blast recalls to the mind of a market writer on the New York Times that "liquor securities never were favorites in Wall Street speculation":

Unlike the oil, radio, utility, and other shares, the "booze stock" just did not seem to carry a popular appeal, altho a few of the more prominent were dealt in actively at times.

One of the reasons was that most of the prosperous corporations were family-owned, with small capitalizations, usually handed down from father to son, and in which the outstanding shares were limited.

In many cases, stock in these enterprises was unobtainable. In the instance of the most widely advertised beers, the producers were closed corporations—family gold-mines—and no stock was available to the public, nor were reports of their earnings published.

A few years ago an attempt was made to popularize a whisky stock on the New York Curb Exchange, but misfortune struck the play; first Prohibition and then a market crash. Most investors lost money.

The advent of new beer stocks on the market was described by the Better Business Bureau as a "racket" to take advantage of the popularity of beer and the possibility that its manufacture and sale would be legalized soon.

Most of these shares were described as rank speculations, being based largely on possibilities, and with prospective earning figures computed on the basis of income which would put a prosperous speak-easy syndicate to shame.

clip-sheet.—"J. B. McK." Newark, N. J.—A clip-sheet is a sheet printed on one side, prepared by a publishing house, a news-service bureau, or other organization, filled with items of varying lengths set similarly to a newspaper column, and sent to newspapers either gratuitously or as a paid service, so that such papers may "clip" such items as may be of particular interest to their readers, or that will conveniently fill gaps in the make-up.

colloquialism, provincialism.—"L. B. P." Mobile, Ala.—A colloquialism is "a form of speech used only or chiefly in conversation." A word or phrase peculiar to a locality is a provincialism.

coterie.—"K. A. H." Wilmington, Del.—The plural of this word is formed regularly by the addition of s—coteries.

debit, debtor.—"H. C." Wilmington, Del.—A debit is a debt recorded in an account, and the person who owes it is a debtor or debitor (abbreviated Dr.). The word debtor, or its abbreviation Dr., is inscribed at the left-hand or debit side of an account.

decibel.—"P. L. D." Newark, N. J.—The decibel is the unit for the measurement of noise. This term has been adopted so recently that it does not occur in any dictionary. Scientists are still using the physical units expressed in terms of dynes per square centimeter.

esophagus.—"M. L. M." St. Louis, Mo.—This is the preferred medical spelling to-day, and has its plural regularly formed by the addition of -es to the singular. The word is directly derived from the Greek oisophagos.

inaugurate.—"D. W." St. Louis, Mo.—This term, from its very origin, carries an inescapable sense of formality and dignity, or of ceremonial. One inaugurates a business, but one begins or starts a plan.

Janet.—"A. V. S." Lorraine, Kan.—The name Janet is customarily accented on the second syllable in the United States, and on the first syllable in England.

jewelry, jewels.—"H. G. C." Atlanta, Ga.—Jewelry is a collective noun and not properly to be used of individual gems or ornaments. Say, "She wore magnificent jewels," but "His stock of jewelry is large."

John Duns Scotus.—"T. M. McC." New York City.—Duns Scotus's followers were called Scottists. When his writings on theology, philosophy, and logic were text-books in the universities, his followers were numerous and respected, but fearing their power, an opposing body arose that resorted to ridicule in its attacks on the scholars—these were the Humanists; then the Reformers followed.

In 1679 Hobbes in "Behemoth" wrote: "Peter Lombard, who first brought in the learning called School-divinity" was seconded by John Scot of Duns, whom any ingenious reader, not knowing what was the design, would judge to have been two of the most egregious blockheads in the world, so obscure and senseless are their writings."

From Duns, the schoolman and subtle sophisticated reasoner, the word degenerated to mean a hair-splitter, caviler, specious reasoner, and thereafter, one whom much study has left dull and stupid, or one who lacks ability to learn; a dullard, blockhead, dunce.

kidnap.—"D. E. H." Harrisburg, Pa.—Under the definition of the verb in the dictionary, we read: "To carry off (a person) from his own country or jurisdiction forcibly, by fraud, or by threats, and take him into another; especially, in ordinary usage, to steal (a child)." We read further: "The term originally meant to carry off or steal, either adults or children, for deportation from England to the American colonies, there to be employed in a servile capacity."

The word was derived from the two words kid, which was originally a low slang word for child, such usage dating to the late sixteenth century, and nap or nab, meaning to snatch or seize. The compound word kidnap was apparently first employed early in the last quarter of the seventeenth century. The earliest record of the term (1678) referred to kidnappers as "those that make a trade of decoying and spiriting away young children to ship them for foreign Plantations." Ten years later, the word included the abduction of adults for the same purpose, and is to-day used to mean the abduction of a child or of an adult.

laitance.—"A. L. F." Brooklyn, N. Y.—The dictionary defines this word as: "A pulplike fluid of the nature of gelatin, which issues from an underwater deposit of cement."

lame duck.—"D. N. A." Valencia, Pa.—This expression has been in common use on the London Stock Exchange since 1791, referring to a broker who can not meet his financial obligations and, therefore, "has to waddle out of the Alley." By whom the meaning of the expression was extended to include Members of Congress who had failed of reelection, and at what period, is unknown.

large, big.—"G. N." Rochester, N. Y.—Large denotes extension in more than one direction, and beyond the average of the class to which the object belongs. We speak of a large surface or a large solid, but of a long line; a large field; a large room; a large apple, etc. A large man is a man of more than ordinary size; a great man is a man of remarkable mental power. Big is a more emphatic word than large, but ordinarily less elegant. We do not say that George Washington was a big man.

lychee.—"E. P. H." Bradenton, Fla.—The spelling lychee is an extremely unusual variant of litchi, which is defined in the dictionary as: "A Chinese tree bearing a strawberry-like fruit; also, the fruit." Other variants are lichee, lich, leeche, leechee, and the Chinese li-chi.

Marcia.—"R. McK." Bessemer, Mich.—Custom favors the pronunciation mar'shi-a—the first a as in art, the second obscure as in final, i as in habit.

news.—"R. C. M." Chicago, Ill.—The word news in the sense of tidings, fresh information, was apparently first employed by James I. of Scotland who wrote: "I bring the news glad, that blisful ben" in 1423. Following that, the word was rarely used for another century, and then it became commonly employed in the sense that we still use to-day. Prior to the time of James I. of Scotland, the word had been in rare previous usage for about fifty years in the sense of novelties or new things.

In the first half of the eighteenth century, there became current a usage that is now archaic or colloquial, making news synonymous with news-paper. "Yes, I saw it in the news."

An attempt has been made to show a derivation from the synonymous Dutch nieuws, but etymologists favor its probable descent from the Anglo-Saxon niwe which may be vaguely traced through various Teutonic tongues back to the Aryan stem neu, from which descended the Greek neos and the Latin novus.

Penelope.—"J. J. L." New York City.—This name is pronounced pi-ne'l'o-pi, in which each i is obscure as in habit, e pronounced as in get, o as in obey, stressed on the second syllable. The French pronounce it pe'ne'lop, each e as in they, o as in go, major stress on the third syllable.

peony.—"J. P. H." Hampden Highlands, Me.—The correct pronunciation is pi'o-ni—the first i as in police, o as in obey, the second i as in hit.

plumb full.—"A. L. M." Dayton, O.—In the colloquial meaning of completely, entirely, plumb is an adverb, and modifies the adjective full in the colloquial expression plumb full. Probably the reason that the expression has never gained the dignity of being compounded, in analogy, to chock-full, is that it never gained the background of cultural acceptance; it is still a homely colloquialism; in fact, British lexicographers label plumb as United States slang.

poacher.—"C. C. H." Jacksonville, Fla.—A poacher is, strictly speaking, an intruder: one who intrudes, pokes or poaches into land where he has no business; the fact that he does so with the intention of spoiling the game is superadded, not lying in the word.

porte-cochère.—"C. E. S." Park Rapids, Minn.—The correct pronunciation is port'-ko' shar'—first o as in go, second o as in obey, sh as in ship, and a as in fare.

presentation.—"E. C. C." Carthage, Ill.—The correct pronunciation is prez'en-te'shan'—first and second e's as in get, third e as in prey, sh as in ship, a as in final.

sompnour, somner, summoner.—"C. E. R." Independence, Mo.—The word sompnour dropped out of usage about 1550; its successor and derivative somner disappeared from English literature about fifty years later. The only clue that we have to its pronunciation is that, following the general phonetics of the times, both spellings were probably pronounced the same—som'ner—o as in not, e as in over. The successor of somner is summoner.

Southern dialect; Southern accent.—"L. R. N." Detroit, Mich.—The Southern dialect and the Southern accent are quite different things. A Southerner, even tho reading aloud from a book that contains no dialect will indicate his origin by intonation, drawl, and the slurring of certain letters and syllables. The Southern dialect is as distinct as the Pennsylvania Dutch, tho less pronounced.

To some extent the Southern dialect is a mixture. Some of it may be traced to the language of the English cavaliers of the early seventeenth century; some to the Spanish, and some to the French. This admixture on the tongue of a black whose vocal cords were not adjusted to any but the most primitive of sounds, gave rise to the so-called Negro dialect, with its many words of purely African origin. This dialect, absorbed by the Southerner, has to some extent influenced his own dialect, but is not necessarily a part of it. The two exist independently, but with much overlapping.

Rule One
for preventing Colds
-a clean system!

If you're nursing a cold, see a doctor. Curing a cold is his business.
But the doctor himself will tell you that you can do much to make yourself less susceptible to colds.

During the colds season it is more important than ever to "keep regular." A clean system is vital in building natural resistance to colds.

But when you use a laxative, be sure it is gentle! It is not safe to experiment.

What Doctors look for in a Laxative

The perfect laxative, according to physicians, is as mild as it is effective.
It limits its action to the intestines.
It does not disturb digestion. It does not gripe. It is not habit-forming.

Ex-Lax checks on every point!
That's why so many leading physicians approve the Ex-Lax way.

Ex-Lax is simply phenolphthalein —that favorite scientific laxative agent — combined with delicious chocolate, in the correct quality, the correct proportion and the correct dose.

Help prevent colds this way!

Heed Nature's laws closely, and you won't catch cold so easily. When Nature needs help—take an Ex-Lax or two. Its pleasant taste and gentleness make Ex-Lax perfect for children as well as grown-ups.

But—be sure you get genuine Ex-Lax—leader for 26 years! Just "any" laxative won't do. It takes
Ex-Lax to get Ex-Lax results.

A Gem Without a Flaw

GEM Blades gather medals on chins where other razors meet their Waterloo. The roughest stubble gives 'em no trouble. Built of surgical steel—which GEMS alone use—steel that dares not nick or dull.

And no beard can balk blades of that temper. We make GEM Blades 50% thicker to give 'em a deep, dogged, wedge-shaped edge. There's no room on usual wafer blades for such a deep, graduated taper.

A GEM Blade never bends, snaps or crumples.

GEM Single-edge Blades fit any GEM frame, no matter how old.

But you can't use the new GEM Double-edge Blade except in the new GEM Micromatic Razor—the latest and greatest of 'em all—with $660,000 of exclusive features that shaving never met before—including dual-alignment, which sets the blade so precisely that it can't skim, scuff or skip.

The first double-edged razor to expose only one numbered edge at a time, protectively covering one edge until the other is used to the full limit of its keenness.

The first double-edged razor with the proper shaving slant shaped in the top, so that you're compelled to shave at the correct angle.

Works with the same smooth, gliding stroke that the barber uses. And works just the same with either single- or double-edged GEMS.

A dollar a set, with five GEM Double-edge Blades. Gold-plated everywhere and sold there, too.

83 out of 100 SLEEP BETTER

When They Take Ovaltine At Night

"83 people out of every 100 sleep better when they take Ovaltine."

This is the statement of an eastern university scientist. Recently he made a test with Ovaltine on 2,500 people. He asked them to take it for three nights straight, and then report as to how they slept.

The people were selected at random. And the test proved that on the average, 83 people per 100 slept better when they took Ovaltine warm at bedtime. Of the remaining 17 per cent, many stated that they already slept perfectly well and did not need any aid.

This practical test merely substantiates scientific facts about Ovaltine that have been known to thousands of doctors and scientists for years.

Ovaltine, as you may know, is a delicious food-drink that was brought to this country from Switzerland. When taken warm at night, it not only brings sleep, but also contains properties that rebuild tissues while you sleep. It makes you waken clear-eyed and refreshed in the morning, your nerves more calm. It also greatly multiplies your ability to recover from fatigue, and enables you to "come back" far more quickly when you are tired.

This Is How It Acts

Authorities state that the three most common causes of sleeplessness are:

- (1) Blood-congested brain cells.
- (2) Digestive unrest.
- (3) Nervous irritability.

Ovaltine is so phenomenally successful because it combats all three.

First: When taken as a warm drink, Ovaltine tends to draw excess blood away from the brain. This combats the mental over-activity, which often keeps you awake when you are trying to get to sleep.

Second: Ovaltine contains in high proportion a unique food property called diastase—a property recognized for its ability to digest the starch content of other foods regularly taken into the stomach. Thus possessing the power to lighten digestive burdens and help the stomach "rest."

Third: Also notable among the constituents of Ovaltine is calcium. And it is increasingly realized that a proper calcium metabolism is necessary to avoid nerve irritation.

Phosphorus, too, is an essential part of brain and nerve cells. Ovaltine supplies this in abundance and in its easily assimilated food form (lecithin)—together with a high proportion of the anti-neuritic Vitamin B.

Thus, a cup of Ovaltine at bedtime not only promotes relaxation and combats digestive unrest but also acts remarkably to overcome sleeplessness due to irritated nerves.

Begin Tonight

So say "goodbye" to sleepless nights. Get acquainted with Ovaltine this very night—and see how quickly you sleep.

As you continue to take Ovaltine, note the permanent benefits it brings. Observe how quickly you fall asleep every night.

See how resistance to fatigue is built up—how "staying power" multiplies.

That's why millions take it night after night, largely on physicians' advice.

But don't judge Ovaltine merely by what is claimed for it. Try it and see for yourself.

'Phone your druggist or grocer for a tin of Ovaltine today. You will sleep more soundly than you have, probably, in weeks and months.

NOTE: Thousands of nervous people, men and women, are using Ovaltine to restore vitality when fatigued. During the World War, medical authorities made it a standard ration for invalid, nerve-shattered soldiers. It is also highly recommended by physicians for nervous, underweight children—and as a strengthening food for nursing mothers, convalescents, and the aged.
